War-time link to killing squad alleged

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — One day after Yom Hashoah, federal authorities announced that Waterloo, Ont., resident Helmut Oberlander is facing loss of his citizenship and deportation for his alleged involvement in a mobile Nazi killing squad.

Oberlander, 72, allegedly failed to divulge to Canadian immigration and citizenship officials his "membership in the German Sicherheitspolizei und SD and Einsatzkommando 10A during the Second World War and [his] participation in the executions of civilians," say court documents filed last week.

Media reports indicate that Oberlander, a former construction worker, has left for the United States. It is unclear when he will return.

According to Holocaust historian Raul Hilberg, Einsatzkommando 10A was a sub-unit of Einsatzgruppe D, one of four killing units that followed the German army into the southern Soviet Union in 1941. The units, in conjunction with local collaborators, engaged in mass shootings of Jewish civilians and others.

In his book, The Destruction of the European Jews, Hilberg chronicles several incidents involving Einsatzkommando 10A. There were an unspecified number of killings in the Ukrainian town of Kodyma, as well as a July 1941 incident in Balti in which "the Romanians [allies of the Nazis] were shooting Jews en masse ... Kommando 10A pitched in by shooting the Jewish community leaders in the town."

Jewish leaders applauded federal authorities for commencing denaturalization proceedings against Oberlander, but urged other cases be launched as well.

"On the eve of the 50th anniversary of the liberation of Nazi death camps by the Allies, it is particularly appropriate to see the alleged perpetrators of unspeakable crimes brought to justice," said Milton Harris, chair of Canadian Jewish Congress' war crimes committee.

Culminating anniversaries

Passover, the paradigm of liberation, this year coincided with the 50th anniversary of another liberation. As a result, The CJN dedicated many pages in the last three issues to a discussion of the personal, collective, religious and historical dimensions of this unique, once-in-a-lifetime occurrence.

EDITORIAL

Today's issue commemorates the culminating anniversaries of the spring season: Yom Ha'atzmaut and 50 years since VE-Day.

In each of these four issues we have featured photos of children to augment the message that prose often inadequately conveys. As we have already written, it is the central message of Passover, of these special anniversaries, indeed of all Jewish history: "And you shall teach your children on that day...".

The News In Brief Everywhere

CANADA

Commons Resolution

OTTAWA — The House of Commons last week passed an all-party motion commemorating the 50th anniversary of the end of World War II and the liberation of the Nazi death camps.

Acting for the government was Treasury Board President Art Eggleton. Representatives from all five parties spoke to the motion, stressing remembrance, modern genocide, the lessons of the Holocaust and the bravery of Canadians who fought in the war.

Supports Militias

CHILLIWACK — A white supremacist here has come out in support of the Oklahoma City bombers and warned that "the loss of life and freedom to come is by far more horrific than the carefully edited images on our television sets."

Charles Scott, who is connected to the American militia movement and the Aryan Nations, has warned his followers to be on alert "because the war has already started."

New CFTAU Chapter

OTTAWA — A new chapter of the Canadian Friends of Tel Aviv University was inaugurated here at a recent reception attended by TAU chancellor Sir Leslie Porter.

About 50 community leaders attended the inauguration, including federal solicitor general Herb Gray.

Canada Council Prize

OTTAWA — University of Toronto law professor Martin Friedland has been awarded the 1994 Canada Council Molson Prize in Social Sciences and Humanities.

The $50,000 annual prize will be awarded to Friedland at a May 3 ceremony at U of T's Hart House.

A former dean of the U of T law school, Friedland is a widely recognized scholar in criminal law.

NIF Internships

TORONTO — The New Israel Fund (NIF) of Canada and one of its grantees, SHATIL, are offering three one-year internships at the NIF's Jerusalem office.

The interns will be provided with orientation and supervision. Established in 1982, SHATIL is the NIF's technical assistance project.

For details, call 416-515-0507.

ISRAEL

Hamas Warning

JERUSALEM — Hamas last Tuesday warned that Israel will pay a "high price" for the death of one of its members under interrogation.

Abed Harizat was arrested in Hebron last week and died of severe head injuries two days later in hospital.

The Justice Ministry is investigating.

Suicide Bombers Course

JERUSALEM — Some 60 Lebanese-Palestinian youths are believed to have enrolled in a course for suicide bombers run by a former Fatah supporter at a refugee camp near Sidon.

"I am here to learn how to liberate my country from the Jews," one 15-year-old told a Beirut newspaper. "I am ready to carry out any mission for Palestine, now that we have become human bombs."

Soldiers Wounded

JERUSALEM — Eleven Israeli soldiers were wounded — none seriously — in a Hezbollah suicide car-bomb attack in the Lebanese security zone last Tuesday.

The attack, in which some 200 kilograms of explosives were used, occurred as a convoy of four army vehicles was taking soldiers to a base.

E. Jerusalem 'is Arab'

JERUSALEM — Jordan's ambassador to Israel, Marwan Muashar, last week called for eastern Jerusalem to "go back to Arab sovereignty," repeating his country's position on the city.

Temple Mount Warning

JERUSALEM — Jewish worship on the Temple Mount, known to Muslims as the Al-Aksa Mosque, will not be tolerated, Muslim leaders in Jerusalem declared last Tuesday at an emergency meeting called in response to recent attempts by Jews to pray there.

"The entire area is a mosque, and according to Islamic law it is forbidden for non-Muslims to pray at a mosque," said Temple Mount director Adnan Husseini.

Flatow's Sister

JERUSALEM — The sister of Alisa Flatow, the 20-year-old New Jersey student killed in last month's suicide bomb attack in the Gaza Strip, is returning to Israel to meet with the recipients of her sister's organs.

Israel Radio reported that Gail Flatow, 18, will soon return from the United States to Jerusalem, where she has been studying.

Flatow's parents decided to donate Alisa's organs for transplant. Two of the six Israelis who received organs have died. The other four are recovering.

Aid to Rwanda

JERUSALEM — Israel is ready to make tens of thousands of dollars worth of emergency aid immediately available to the Rwandan government, Deputy Foreign Minister Yossi Beilin announced last week.

Beilin said Israel is ready to send medical and food supplies.

WORLD

Say Sorry, Carlos

NEW YORK — The Simon Wiesenthal Centre has asked Argentine President Carlos Menem to apologize for having read an Easter Sunday message which contained the age-old claim that the Jews killed Jesus.

The centre urges Menem "to repudiate the charge of deicide, to sanction the staff member who prepared the material and to disassociate [himself] from those Catholic leaders who insist on continuing to incite religious hatred and intolerance."

Defends Iran Ties

NEW YORK — In a visit here last month, German Foreign Minister Klaus Kinkel defended his country's controversial relationship with Iran.

"We, along with our [European Union] partners, hold the view that isolating important countries in the region does not promote the peace process," said Kinkel.

Omission

The interview with Aba Bayefsky in the Yom Hashoah supplement omitted the name of the interviewer Cynthia Gasner. The omission was inadvertent but inexcusable for which the editor apologizes.

Jews have moral duty to prevent genocide: Cotler

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jews everywhere have a moral duty to try and prevent ethnic slaughter and genocide in the world today, human rights champion Prof. Irwin Cotler told last week's Yom Hashoah V'Hagvurah services here.

"We cannot say we didn't know about unspeakable ethnic cleansing in the Balkans and preventable genocide" in Rwanda. "Our response has to be to shatter the walls of the world's appalling indifference," keynote speaker Cotler told over 1,000 people at Adath Israel Congregation.

The annual service was sponsored by the synagogue and the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem. Just prior to the commemoration, some 400 people, including a strong contingent from the Toronto Jewish Youth Council and Jewish students from secular high schools, gathered at the Yad Vashem Holocaust Memorial in Earl Bales Park for a wreath-laying and service in the cold rain, then marched down Bathurst Street in a silent candlelight procession to the shul.

Cotler, a former Canadian Jewish Congress president, said the lessons of the Holocaust should propel Jews to launch an offensive on human rights — "the new secular religion of our times."

While the world witnesses the emigration of Russian, Ethiopian and Syrian Jews, it has also "abandoned" the Kurds, the Balkans and other global tragedies, he said.

Today, Holocaust survivors almost have to "sanitize" their stories in order to be believed, and as more of them die, the world faces a vacuum of memory and hope, he added.

Cotler listed world Jewry's woes, including Holocaust denial — "the ultimate assault on Jewish memory" — the presence of Nazi war criminals in Canada ("a moral obscenity") and the constitution of Hamas, "the only post-Nazi constitution that openly calls for the murder of Jews, wherever they are."

He warned that if governments do not bring Nazi war criminals to justice, the Holocaust will one day become less believable because people would think "if there were no criminals, there was no Holocaust."

In his d'var Torah, Adath Israel Rabbi Steven Saltzman said Jews are obliged to "seek out their killers," but also to find and pay homage to Gentiles who rescued Jews during the war.

Greetings were brought by Israel's Consul General Dror Zeigerman and Canadian Society for Yad Vashem national chair Joel Dimitry.

Adath Israel Rabbi Emeritus Erwin Schild recounted personal reminiscences about the fall of Berlin in 1945.

Memorial candles were lit for the six million, including the 1.5 children killed; the children of survivors; partisans and resistance fighters; Allied armed forces; and the Righteous Among the Nations.

A Yom Hashoah service was held April 23 at Toronto's Holocaust museum, sponsored by the Betar-Tagar, Young Judaea, Tsabar and Ezra youth movements.

Participants included Cantor Yehuda Rottner, child Holocaust survivor Osi Sladek, and March of the Living participant Amy Sharon. Neshama Carlebach sang Eli, Eli, accompanied by Marina Zelcer on violin.

The event was organized by Tami Savion of the Israel Youth Program Centre.

— The CJN will have more coverage of other Yom Hashoah services in next week's edition.

CJC delegates to probe body's mandate

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Delegates to the Canadian Jewish Congress Plenary Assembly this month will be asked to examine the very structure and mandate of the 76-year-old institution.

In a series of resolutions, Congress is called upon to become more democratic, to be more selective about the issues it deals with and to find additional means of finance.

One says Congress' involvement in the "issue of the day" may "diffuse and even trivialize other matters that are of vital importance to the Jewish community" and suggests it draw up written "guiding principles" that will give the Congress mandate more focus.

Such parameters would help officers and executive decide whether Congress should address issues outside specifically Jewish concern, according to Larry Riteman, chair of the Atlantic region's Holocaust remembrance committee, who submitted the resolution.

Another, from the Ontario region, notes that Congress has "seen fewer and fewer members of the Jewish community involved in key decisions directing Congress policy and its implementation..."

In order to "be relevant to and have credibility with the breadth of Canadian Jewry," the resolution says Congress must do more to gain regular input from "all corners" of the Jewish community.

It urges that an independent committee be formed to come up with ways of making Congress more democratic.

The Ontario region suggests that the formula for selecting delegates-at-large to the triennial plenary assemblies be changed to give more adequate representation to Jews from coast to coast in light of the geographic shift in the distribution of the Jewish population.

But a joint resolution from the Ontario and Pacific regions claims that Congress' current level of funding is not adequate to meet the "increasing demands" on the organization.

It urges the community's national funding body, the National Budgeting Conference, give Congress more money at the national and regional levels.

At the same time, Congress should seek new sources of income, which will not conflict with local federation campaigns, including doing its own fundraising.

Congress may be having trouble fulfilling its traditional mandate, but that has not stopped the Ontario region from urging it to take on a key role in fostering Israel-Diaspora relations.

The Pacific region wants Congress to work with the Canadian Arab community on such common issues as human rights and multiculturalism, in a resolution on Arab-Jewish relations.

Elsewhere, Canadian unity is dealt with in a brief resolution from the Quebec region affirming support for federalism, and that Congress be "receptive to the evolution of the federal system for the benefit of all Canadians."

Another on 'rapprochement' says Congress should express support for francophone communities outside Quebec in their effort to preserve their language and enter into a dialogue with La Federation des Francophones Hors Quebec, which represents such communities.

There will be fewer resolutions put before delegates at this plenary May 14-15 — 32 under 12 headings.

Students get support after high school vandalized

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate (JWC) students have received letters of support from students at Arthur Day School in response to the discovery of neo-Nazi graffiti found spray-painted on two walls of the Jewish high school in March.

"Some of the kids in one of their Grade 8 classes wrote to our students," says JWC principal Jerry Cohen. "Their letters contained mainly expressions of regret and empathy. A couple expressed outrage. The kids also asked questions about our school. We passed the letters on to our Grade 8 classes."

Arthur Day is a junior high school in Transcona in east Winnipeg, an area of few if any Jewish residents. The incident at JWC however coincided with a unit on Judaism and the Holocaust that Debbie Hamlin's language arts class is currently studying.

Hamlin, a member of the Transcona-Springfield School Division's Equity and Race Relations Committee, reports that she and the two other teachers she works with in her team received funding from the provincial Department of Multiculturalism to teach the unit on racism.

The unit also included Holocaust-related novels by Winnipeg writer Carol Matas, a viewing of the Winnipeg Jewish Theatre production of The Always Prayer Shawl and a presentation on the Holocaust by Hersh Zentner of the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council Holocaust Awareness Committee Speakers Bureau.

"Mr. Zentner challenged the students to take personal action against racism," Hamlin reports. "Twenty-five chose to write to Joseph Wolinsky."

Cohen notes that the Grade 8 students at JWC are currently drafting replies to the Arthur Day students' letters.

Israel still needs Diaspora help

YOM HA'ATZMAUT MESSAGE
by DROR ZEIGERMAN
CONSUL GENERAL OF ISRAEL

Forty-seven years ago the State of Israel was created as a Jewish homeland, fulfilling the Zionist dream of gathering the Jewish people in Eretz Yisrael. In the forty-seven years of her existence, the State of Israel has seen her population grow from a half million to over four million Jews today.

The gates of Israel were opened to allow people oppressed in countries around the world the chance to immigrate to Israel. To welcome people from Eastern Europe, Russia, Ethiopia and the Arab countries became the main struggle of our country. These immigrants have become part of Israeli society as cultural, political and economic leaders. We are proud of their accomplishments as they contribute so much to Israeli society.

In order to successfully absorb these people we need the support of the world Jewish community. This support will have to be political, financial and personal. Aliyah forms the essence of our existence and we must encourage aliyah from the West. If we succeed in absorbing these people, Israel will flourish. Successful absorption will open the way for economic independence.

In order for the Zionist dream to be realized, we must achieve peace with our Arab neighbors. In the past year we have made important progress, as evidenced by the comprehensive peace treaty that we signed with Jordan. There is consensus in Israel regarding this peace agreement, because we are getting peace and giving peace without the necessity of giving back territory and uprooting settlements. The Palestinians and the Syrians must understand that peace is in both our interests, and only if they are ready to compromise can there be real peace. I hope that in the coming year Lebanon and Syria will join Egypt and Jordan and sign a peace agreement with Israel.

On Yom Ha'atzmaut it is important to stress the consensus of the people of Israel: united Jerusalem will forever be the capital of Israel and the belief that peace will help us fulfill the Zionist dream to gather Jews in the land of Israel and live in security. Only if we succeed with peace and absorption will we achieve the dream. We see the Jewish community throughout the world, including Canadian Jews, as partners in this exciting progress. Israel shares strong ties with the Diaspora, and Jews always have a home in Israel.

Political decisions

Scene in Ottawa

By RICHARD CLEROUX

OTTAWA — Former Liberal MP David Berger spends his days waiting to take up a political appointment that most Canadian Jews would greatly envy — Canadian ambassador to Israel.

Four months ago, Berger gave up one of the most secure Liberal ridings in the country, Saint-Henri-Westmount.

Berger stepped down so that the Liberals' new Quebec star, Lucienne Robillard, could parachute into a safe riding. Everything worked out according to plan and Robillard was handed the Liberal nomination. She easily won the ensuing byelection on Feb. 13. Soon afterwards, Prime Minister Jean Chrétien appointed her labor minister, and since then she has given a good account of herself.

Berger ended up on the sidelines. He was given a job, but it was hardly one to write home about. He went into the Prime Minister's Office as a special advisor on small business — little more than a desk and a telephone and the use of the Prime Minister's Office letterhead — no staff, no department and no program to administer. It was clearly a step down from travelling across the country heading the Commons industry committee, holding public meetings and openly confronting the banks on their loan policies.

Berger's decision to retire from his political career at 45 was surprising — especially since only two years earlier he had successfully fought off a plot by the party's backroom boys to oust him just before the 1993 election. They wanted to run Liberal party president Don Johnston in his place. Berger stood his ground, rallied his supporters and fought off the intrigue.

Slap in the face

Chrétien gave Berger the dubious distinction of being the only incumbent Liberal MP obliged to face a nominating convention before he could run again. It was a slap in the face and it stung. However, whatever ill feeling there might have been did not appear to last long, because soon afterwards Berger was appointed to the prestigious committee chairmanship.

Since it was obvious that Berger had not resigned because he had done something wrong, speculation arose that something better than merely a "special advisor" job as in store for him.

At the end of March, CBC television reporter Jason Moscovitz was told that Berger was in line for the Tel Aviv posting, ahead of a long list of career diplomats at Foreign Affairs.

People jumped to the conclusion that the Prime Minister's Office had floated the tip to Moscovitz as a trial balloon. Moscovitz believes his source was actually leaking the information to prevent, not help, Berger's appointment. The same source told Moscovitz that the prime minister was also thinking of appointing former Conservative prime minister Kim Campbell to Moscow, something that did not go over so well with Liberals.

Leak may have backfired

At first both pending appointments were vehemently denied. Liberal House Leader Herb Gray called them "gossip" and "rumor." But the talk persisted, at least in Berger's case. It made sense. Why else would Berger have stepped down for so little?

The leak may have actually backfired on the person who gave out the information and helped Berger's case. Today the leak is more than rumor. Although the Campbell "rumor" has been dismissed, the Berger "rumor" has been elevated to the status of an official "no comment."

The Prime Minister's Office is saying "the prime minister will decide," which in Ottawa means the Berger appointment is coming soon.

First they have to find a job for the current Canadian ambassador to Israel, Norman Spector.

Spector was former prime minister Brian Mulroney's principal secretary until the Meech Lake fiasco. Somebody had to be the fall guy, so Spector, a nice enough guy, who was Jewish as well, was conveniently shipped off to the land of Israel, where by all accounts he has done a splendid job as Canada's representative.

Among other things, he helped set up a hockey team in Israel, while the Toronto Maple Leafs donated equipment. So what if the Israeli ice rink isn't regulation size? It's hockey, isn't it?

Spector could end up somewhere in the Privy Council Office, back in his old job as a government mandarin.

In the meantime, Berger, who would be only the second Jew appointed Canadian ambassador to Israel (Spector was the first) hangs around Ottawa waiting.

"I'm a very patient man," Berger says laconically. "The prime minister will decide. Call me at home if you want to talk."

The rest of the Berger family may not be so laconic. His daughter Laura was taking part in a Passover rehearsal recently at the school she attends in Ottawa.

"L'Shanah haba'ah b'Yerushalayim" the class chorused. She said her daddy told her that in her case it would be so.

Out of the mouths of babes.

On Passover, we carried the photos of the young children practising a mini-Seder and also of the youngsters arriving in their new home in Israel one year after liberation from Buchenwald. On chol hamoed, in our Mimouna supplement, we published the photo of Brigitte Dayan, paying loving homage to the memory, the customs and the traditions of her great grandfather. Last week, as an illustration of the "classic Jewish response" to the Shoah, we reproduced the photo of two little boys learning, teaching each other, studying Torah.

In this issue, we publish the precious photo of little Aliza Zigler waving Israel's flag. All the themes of the past four weeks converge in this one photo. It is both symbol and reminder, comfort and cause, past and present.

The blue of the flag symbolizes the blue of the sky. Under heaven we are reminded of the truly human aspirations and purposes of life: decency and goodness. Our children must carry forward all that past generations have borne to this point. Like Israel, they are our hope.

Yom Hazikaron

A story is told about a Jew from Canada who visited Jerusalem on Yom Hazikaron, the day set aside by the Knesset to remember Israel's fallen soldiers. He went to Har Herzl to take part in the remembrance ceremonies.

As often happens in the hills of Jerusalem in early May, even before noon, the sky was a very deep blue, the kind of blue that falls closer to violet than to green, the kind of blue that must have been t'chelet. A mild breeze blew from the valley to the west, cool against the sun, carrying whispers through the branches of the pine trees. And the quality of the light was dazzling, allowing the eye to see the smallest detail on the furthermost horizon.

There were many people on the mountain that clear spring morning, almost all of them hovering for a time near a grave, leaving behind a stone or a flower, a marker of their permanent love.

After the remembrance ceremony, the Canadian happened to notice an old man crying inconsolably at one particular grave site. As he moved closer and could hear the old man's sobbing, he understood the grave to be that of the old man's son. Others, undoubtedly members of the family, tried to comfort the old man and remove him from his anguish and his grief. But the old man refused to be comforted, and refused to be moved. Instead, he stretched his arms across the grave, embracing the stone, occasionally tracing with his bony fingers the name etched permanently into the rock's hewn face, quietly sobbing.

The Canadian sat nearby, terribly shaken by the old man's loss and overwhelmed by his sorrow. He watched as mourning matched memory and grief poured forth endlessly from the parent like the relentless rays of the sun high above in the deep blue sky.

Yom Ha'atzmaut

The next day, which actually began that night, the Canadian Jew went out into the boulevards and avenues of Jerusalem to celebrate Yom Ha'atzmaut with the rest of Israel. The streets were alive with festival and song. The small park near his hotel was filled with picnics and parties.

By a coincidence of light and timing, his eye caught sight of a group across the way singing, laughing and dancing. As he approached the group, hoping to join the circle, he noticed that in its very middle was the same old man whose heart he had seen broken the day before. He was swaying and twirling, waving his arms and singing with energy and enthusiasm.

Unable to contain his curiosity, he went over to the old man and asked him politely, in the manner of most Canadians: "Only yesterday, I saw you lie down at your son's grave, calling to heaven, your tears watering the earth. How can you dance and celebrate this way today?"

The old man seemed pleased with the question. "How can I not celebrate this way? My son fought and died so that I would be able to dance and sing this day."

The Canadian Jew understood and was immediately welcomed to join in the dancing circle, which he did.

Says editorial misrepresented his views

I'd like to respond to your recent editorial, "Skepticism that tarnishes," (CJN, April 6), which criticized a column of mine in the Globe and Mail on the subject of Steven Speilberg's Holocaust documentation project. I believe your editorial seriously misrepresented my column to your readers.

Your editorial said I "questioned the project's worthiness." Yet the column was titled, "Reservations about a worthy project." I never questioned the worthiness of documenting experiences of the Holocaust. My reservation concerned Spielberg's tendency to Hollywoodize and commercialize almost everything he touches. I gave many examples. I said I preferred the work of documenation done by many sincere people long before Spielberg more or less took over the field.

Your editorial said I "speculated on the motives of the survivors for wanting their stories to be recorded." I never did so. The motives of survivors who speak out are well-known and completely understandable. Speculation about that would be stupid. I did broaden the subject to the proliferation of historical documentation in our time (documenting women's history, labor history, the history of the blues, etc.) and asked why such documentation seems so urgent today, especially to those like filmmakers and oral historians who are doing it. I suggested an answer which I felt was respectful to the motives involved and said I support such efforts.

Your editorial said my column "concluded with a question, as provocative as it was rhetorical. "What's accomplished by documenting any of this?" As I've just explained, the question was not rhetorical but genuine; it was about historical documentation in general, not only the Holocaust; and I provided an answer which in my view justifies such documentation rather than impugning it. Furthermore that question did not "conclude" my column; it occurred about two-thirds of the way through. The column did not conclude with a question but with a statement: "No one deserves to die- or live- unknown." That is the exact opposite of the claim your editorial made about my views on the matter.

Angered by strike of teachers

I fully concur with the comments made by Barry Goldman in the article entitled "UCS strike angers parents" (CJN April 20), who stated that "the teachers acted in a wholly unprofessional and inappropriate manner." I just would like to add two more adjectives namely, "they were reckless and irresponsible."

I was one of those parents who car-pooled on April 2 with four children, from Thornhill to the Beth David Synagogue. As soon as I arrived back at my home, I had a frantic call from my child crying, "Please come back immediately, the teachers abandoned us and left the classroom without any supervision." Thanks to the alertness of the principal and three or four parents, who were in the school, they were able to direct the 200 students to the gymnasium until all parents came to pick up their children and avoid the serious consequences of leaving those students without supervision.

I have no sympathy at all toward the teachers who are driven by greed and nothing else. Seven out of the nine teachers at UCS have jobs in other schools and their part-time position is an income supplement, and a good one.

In these difficult times when people should be happy that they have a job these teachers are holding on to two jobs and trying to milk the school and the parents to the maximum. Their action is a black mark on the Hebrew teaching profession. Shame! Shame!

UJPO states its position on Israel

We read with some surprise your story, "UJPO Rejoins Congress," in the March 16 issue. The article in question carried the byline of Ben Rose, although it was in fact Gil Kezwer of the Jewish Telegraphic Agency (JTA) who interviewed us by telephone on March 6.

In the original JTA story by Mr. Kezwer in the agency's March 17 release, there are a number of inaccuracies which reappear in The CJN. While taking a strong left-wing position on many issues over the years, the United Jewish People's Order (and its Toronto predecessor, the Jewish Labor League) has always been independent of political parties. We therefore regret that CJC president Irving Abella used clichés of the witch-hunt era to characterize the "former" UJPO.

Also, the impression is given that the UJPO has suddenly become a supporter of Israel. A large contingent of our members, young and old, marched in the community parade in Toronto in 1948 shortly after the proclamation of the independence of Israel. True, in subsequent years, we criticized policies of Israeli governments which we felt were not in the interests of the people of Israel. Our positions on these issues were similar to those taken by groups like Canadian Friends of Peace Now and others.

With regard to Israel, our longstanding policy document reads, in part:

"Our organization is committed to a viable, secure and prosperous State of Israel. We encourage and support peace movements there. We consider the State of Israel to be a very important sector of the Jewish people and its worldwide communities.

"While supporting the existence and stability of the State of Israel, we consider it our responsibility to voice our opinions as to those policies and actions of Israel which endanger the existence of the State of Israel and peace in the region."

Concurrently, we have opposed the rejectionists of both camps and denounced the fundamentalist suicide bombers of recent months.

Perspectives

Looking Back On Five Years

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

Itzhak Shelef looks back on five years as Israel's ambassador to Canada with a mixture of sentiment and satisfaction.

For the 58-year-old envoy, whose term in Ottawa ends this summer, it's been a heady time, he conceded in a recent wide-ranging CJN interview. When he was appointed in December 1990 (after having served as minister-counsellor at Israel's embassy from 1981 to 1985), the intifadah and its resulting PR fallout were raging, Soviet olim were pouring into an underprepared Israel and the peace process seemed to be heading nowhere. Canada was a bit player on the Mideast stage, known chiefly for peacekeeping.

Then came the Gulf War. Iraqi Scuds rained on Israeli cities, civilians donned gas masks in sealed rooms and Israel refrained from retaliating against Saddam Hussein, at least for the time being.

Apart from defanging Saddam, the war realigned Middle East alliances, and in the process, the entire world, including Canada, came together in an unprecedented effort to bring peace to the region once and for all.

For Shelef, it was the 1991 Madrid Conference kicking off the peace process and the 1993 signing on the White House lawn of the Declaration of Principles which brought what he calls "dramatic" changes to how the world — including Canada — viewed Israel.

And ever since, Shelef has presided over a veritable parade of advances in Canada-Israel relations — arguably more over the past four years than in the previous decade. These have been the so-called peace dividends.

But the job began as a baptism by fire. Not only were there war clouds gathering over the Mideast, but it was also in December 1990 that then Israeli cabinet minister Moshe Arens told the Canadian Jewish Congress executive that Canada-Israel relations had nowhere to go but up. The widely-reported remark hit a sour chord in Canada's Jewish community, and Shelef had to hit the ground running.

He's been running ever since. The ambassador's first priority was to widen and deepen economic relations between Israel and Canada, and his efforts seem to have paid off. "Economic relations today cannot be compared to what they were four or five years ago," he says. "We are the first country with which Canada established a joint fund for research and development, and the first country not on the American continent with which Canada is negotiating a free trade agreement. These are breakthroughs." Even so, Shelef is disappointed free trade could not come sooner, because its absence has forced many Israeli companies to trade instead with the United States, which has had a free trade pact with Israel for years.

"For us, [free trade] is a priority because we are an exporting country, and both Canada and Israel are traders. We realize the future is in the economy."

For Canada, a deal with Israel would mean greater imports of high tech industrial products, computer software and medical equipment, Shelef feels, while Israel would be able to buy tariff-free Canadian natural resources, lumber and prefabricated houses. "But the real future is in joint ventures between Canadian and Israeli companies."

Another disappointment for him has been Canada's continuing — even increasing — acceptance of Israelis as refugees. In 1994, Canada granted refugee status to a record 380 claimants from Israel (in addition to 300 in the previous five years), the vast majority originally from the former Soviet Union. Typically, their claims allege harassment and even physical persecution in Israel, where they received citizenship upon arrival, because of their mixed status as Jews.

The ambassador was thrust into the fray last summer when the issue boiled over and Israel asked Canada to stop believing the claims. Ottawa, in effect, told Jerusalem to mind its own business. It was a low point in relations, but Shelef diplomatically chalks it up to Canada's inability "to realize that Israel is a democracy that does not produce refugees. This [policy of accepting claims] is something we cannot understand, and we'll never be able to understand it." Canada, he says, is known in Israel as a haven for those making refugee claims — claims Israel says are spurious.

Shelef does have high marks for the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC), which he says has done "a good job" lobbying for Israel. "If the CIC did not exist, there would be several voices for Israel, and the strength of the Jewish community is in its unity. It's a warm community which very much cares about Israel. But it has to work hard to keep a united voice."

Bilateral relations over the last five years have added up, Shelef says, to a big boost for Israel and increased stature for Canada in the Jewish state.

"Until the past few years, Canada was active in peacekeeping, in the Golan Heights and in the United Nations. But that has changed, and during my tenure, Canada became actively involved in the political process of the Middle East."

Itzhak Shelef

Indeed, Jerusalem and Ottawa have chalked up the following accomplishments:

- Despite pressure from all political quarters, then prime minister Brian Mulroney refused to link the Gulf War to the Arab-Israeli conflict and the plight of Palestinians.
- Canada continues to "hold the gavel" on one of the most sensitive of the five multilateral working groups on Middle East peace — the problem of Palestinian refugees and their self-described right of return to Israel. Two sessions were held in Ottawa in 1992. Israel boycotted the first and walked out of the second — only to return hours later — because of the participation of so-called diaspora Palestinians, those from outside the territories. Other sessions have followed around the world and Canada has won praise for the steady way it has chaired the round.
- Canada is also a member of the steering committee of the multilateral track and as a participant in the other rounds, has facilitated several projects geared toward the betterment of life in the Gaza Strip, including a rainwater catchment scheme and an updated refugee databank.
- In 1993 in Sydney, N.S., Canada hosted a workshop on how to avoid conflicts at sea. The Senior Naval Officers Symposium, attended by Israel and Arab nations, was designed to bring about maritime confidence building measures, using Canadian expertise. Other workshops have been held at sea.
- Ottawa has earmarked $55 million over five years toward the international aid effort for Gaza and Jericho. That includes $4 million to help repatriate to Gaza some 4,000 Palestinian refugees who lived in Canada Camp, an abandoned Canadian military installation in Egypt.
- In 1993, Canada and Israel signed an unprecedented joint venture in high-tech research and development. The Canada-Israel Industrial Research and Development Fund (CIIRDF) is designed to promote cooperation between the two countries in private sector high-tech R&D.
- Perhaps the biggest changes have come in bilateral trade, which increased by 20 per cent in the past five years. High level trade delegations travelled to Israel from Quebec and in 1993, Ontario Premier Bob Rae led 12 blue-chip businesspeople on a mission to Jordan and Israel to forge alliances in high-tech R&D. Rae and other political leaders have long called for a Canada-Israel free trade pact, and in late 1994, prime ministers Yitzhak Rabin and Jean Chretien shook hands in Ottawa on the start to free trade talks. Observers believe removal of tariffs could boost two-way trade by billions of dollars. Alberta Premier Ralph Klein is now preparing for a June trip to Israel to discuss trade.

As for Canada's image in Israel, Shelef says it's been burnished over the years by our reputation for fairness, as well as for highly visible landmarks that have changed Israelis' way of life: the country's first supermarkets, SuperSol, were Canadian-built; Jerusalem's new City Hall was designed by Toronto architect Jack Diamond; the Super-Pharm chain of drugstores was built by the Koffler family; and Montreal developer David Azrieli has erected Israel's first shopping malls. The Bronfmans and others have invested heavily in Israel over the years.

Unlike many in the Jewish community who complain about an anti-Israel bias in the Canadian media, the ambassador feels the major media's coverage of Israel, while "there have been problems from time to time," has been "balanced."

Shelef was a visible envoy, criss-crossing the country to meet with media and community groups and to speak at universities, where his reception was often less than hospitable. "Those were not easy audiences," he says. "But I enjoyed it. What I found was that Jewish students were not active enough, and much more should be done on the campuses."

The ambassador, a lawyer by training, is looking forward to returning to his native Jerusalem, where his wife, Malka, is head nurse at the Hadassah Medical Centre. The couple has four grown children and two grandchildren.

Shelef, who came to Ottawa after postings in Addis Ababa and Tokyo, will take fond memories of Canada back to Israel: "I came to appreciate the Canadian way of life and the way problems are tackled. That's what's so special about Canada."

In honor of Yom Ha'atzmaut, The Embassy of Israel and the CJN invited junior and high school students to submit a short essay on the subject:What Israel Means to Me. We received many well-written and evocative essays. But only two, one from Junior High and one from High School, could be judged the "winning" essays. They appear on page 12. We do wish, however, to single out for special mention, the following submissions and have excerpted a line from each to convey the sense of their authors' efforts.

"Israel is a part of me, a part without which I would not be complete."
Renee Kestelman, Grade 11

"Israel's soil was the only soil where the commandments of the Lord could be given."
Lori Sabo, Grade 11

"I stand on its land, and revel in its air, laden with centuries of history."
Yaakov Wagner, Grade 13

"Israel means life and freedom." Wendy Kaufman, Grade 9

"Israel is the core of my Jewish existence." Craig Nathanson, Grade 10

When a friend dies

We met first some 50 years ago and the unusual happened. The four of us took to one another as if we had always been friends.

By Rabbi Dr. Gunther Plaut

They were David and Aviva Polish. She was the daughter of the distinguished Cleveland educator A. H. Friedland and he, like me, an assistant rabbi serving in Chicago. Who knows what that indefinable something is that draws people together? It does not merely come from an exchange of ideas and parallel thinking — though these play a role. There is something else as well, a sense of certainty that each can rely on the other — and the wonderful thing was that our wives felt the same way. Our children too became part of the equation, and our sons became rabbis, schoolmates in the same seminary.

David was older than I and more learned, an added incentive for me to seek his company. We began to spend our vacations together, which made our leisure time very special. World War II was over and we all looked forward to a life rich in promise and hope. We possessed very little in earthly goods, but we laughed a lot and enjoyed life to the fullest.

David had little time for small talk. He and his wife were flaming Zionists. Both spoke fluent Hebrew and were unconditional lovers of their people. Their values matched ours and we felt comfortable with each other.

In the years that followed we were separated: he remaining in the Chicago area and eventually founding a new synagogue in Evanston, while we moved to Minnesota and later to Toronto. As time went on, we saw each other less and less frequently. Still, there were conferences and exchanges of pulpits; there was David's increasing output of scholarly writings, which brought his thinking to our home. Among these were not only books on history and theology, there were also weekly columns significantly called Minority Report. David was a clear and precise thinker who more often than not went against the mainstream of what was popular. He did not hesitate to criticize the establishment and he, the consummate lover of Israel, did not shrink from extending his criticism to Zionist policy when such views could be held privately but were taboo in public discussion.

As his reputation grew, he became a force not only in Chicago but in the country at large. He was a delegate to world Zionist conventions and was a natural choice for president of the Central Conference of American Rabbis. He became one of those who helped to turn the Reform Movement toward a more traditional path. His Guide for Reform Jews (co-authored with the late Fredrick Doppelt) was the forerunner of a return to halachic values which culminated in the movement's acceptance of Gates of Mitzvah, of which in many ways he was the spiritual father.

In the last few years he was ailing and our calendars began to diverge. But when the call came that he had died, my wife and I knew that something very precious had gone out of our lives. He had been seriously ill but demanded that he be checked out of the hospital so that he could celebrate seder with his family. He did so indeed with his usual intellectual vigor and rigor, with his laughter and the all-encompassing love that he had for his dear ones. All of his children and grandchildren were present. He was the old David Polish once again, so I am told, and two days later he died at home in his sleep.

I went to the funeral, not as a participant, but in respect of a great leader and dear friend. I sat with the family and listened with them and the large congregation of mourners to the tributes paid by his son, his son-in-law and four rabbis of different denominations. The multi-faceted nature of his personality became ever so apparent. Still, all of them had one thing in common: David had been a model for them in their lives and in their strivings. He had always challenged people to thought and value formation and urged them on to higher goals at whatever the cost.

The funeral was a celebration of a great man's life, and I felt the palpable emotion mixed with a kind of spiritual happiness which said: Here was a man we knew. He was our leader, our inspiration and our friend. His place is empty, but we are all the better for having known him and all the richer for his having lived and worked among us.

Celebrating Yom Ha'atzmaut

Celebrating Yom Ha'atzmaut in Israel is exciting. The first time I had this experience was in 1967 before the Six Day War.

By Jack Chisvin

It was a different, seemingly smaller Israel then. The countryside was pastoral, the cities less congested, and it was easy to get around. In the two days prior to Yom Ha'atzmaut, I travelled the length of the country and everywhere I went I could sense that something momentous was about to happen. There was a feeling of anticipation in the air — the sights, sounds and smells of history in the making.

Faced Jordanian soldiers

From the Israeli side of a fence demarcating Gaza, I saw the armies of Egypt relentlessly marching. In Ramat Rachel, I faced Jordanian soldiers across barbed wire, pointing their rifles directly at me, ready to shoot. Paradoxically on the border with Lebanon, the tension eased as the Lebanese soldiers posed for photographs with anyone brave (foolish?) enough to approach them.

Although the country was under siege, surrounded by Arab armies, the people showed no signs of despair. The uncertainty challenged their hopes rather than playing to their fears. They were living in the present with their eyes fixed steadily on the future, knowing that their glory years were still ahead. In this state of national self-confidence the tenacious Jewish spirit abounded.

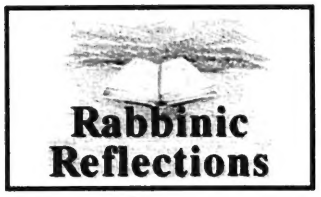
Festivities took place throughout the country. I was part of a privileged audience at a spectacular military tatoo in the university stadium in Jerusalem. Displaying military might was politically correct in those days. I spontaneously revelled with the others, children and adults, in the streets of Tel Aviv. Finally, from my hotel room balcony in Haifa, I could see a ship in the harbor, festooned with lights silhouetting the number 19 in honor of the occasion.

Yom Ha'atzmaut is a holiday for celebrating the coming together of a distinct nation, of which every Jew, whatever manner of life, station or shade of belief, is a member. It is a nation which includes all of us scattered around the world, constituting one indivisible people bound by a common history and a common destiny, determined forever to be masters of our own fate.

On Yom Ha'atzmaut we relate to Israel unlike at any other time. We rejoice in Jewish pride. Proud that all of Israel, from the lonely kibbutz to the bustling city, was built by the labor and devotion of Jews alone and we need not feel obliged to anyone for that which is good, nor apologetic for that which is bad,

Today as in 1967, Israel is on the edge, teetering between anxiety and exhilaration. It is still a troubled and dissonant land. But on this Yom Ha'atzmaut as we celebrate Israel's independence, we sing in our anthem — Hatikvah — a message that Jewish hope is alive, and from our dissonance we sound one pure, clear harmonious note to soothe our torn and lacerated spirits.

We must strive to be distinctive



By RABBI YOSIL ROSENZWEIG

One of the difficulties the Jewish people face today is an estrangement from Jewish culture. After Khurban Europa — the European Holocaust — three million dazed Jewish refugees were quickly forced back into society.

Broken lives had to be rebuilt and with urgency. Lifestyle decisions that were made were often at the expense of Jewish culture. Many felt that to get ahead they had to put aside traditions, language, rituals, even belief, for the greater good that the modern world could offer.

Recent studies agree that the Jewish world is in crisis. The alienation of our people from Jewish values and commitments leaves a void that yearns to be filled. Being "normal" in a world full of ever changing options has taken a great toll on our collective consciousness.

All but our large Jewish communities are slowly withering away. Synagogues everywhere are looking for ways to attract the disenfranchised; Jewish community centres are trying to appeal to the unaffiliated; and if it weren't for legalized gambling, many of our service organizations could not finance their ongoing projects.

But this does not have to remain the trend. Our Torah portion this week provides us with the solution to the spiritual trauma we are witnessing. G-d says to Israel, "Kidoshim Ti'hiyu Ki Kadosh Ani" — you shall be holy for I am Holy. Having lost the ability to communicate in the Hebrew language, most of us comprehend kedushah as holiness. A preferable translation would be "distinctiveness." If we consider the land of Israel holy, then it is because among the nations of the world it stands out. If the Jewish people are thought to be holy, then rather than believing that we are better, we must understand ourselves to be unique to the world community.

The Torah teaches us that since our G-d is distinctive, so too must we be distinctive. G-d's distinctive feature (as we explained just a few weeks ago at the Passover seder) is that He personally cares for His people Israel. Forced by famine into Egypt, we were forged into a nation. When we cried out for liberation, He heard our prayers and delivered us from bondage. He is a G-d of action, not just promises. We are a nation of accomplishments, not just believers.

In order to attract the disenfranchised and the unaffiliated, we must reconnect to the culture that produced the great minds of yesteryear. Our concern for becoming "normal" has deprived us of the uniqueness of our holiness. Ask a Christian who are the chosen people and he will right away tell you, "the Jews." Ask a Jew what it means to be the chosen people and he/she will rationalize how we're not so different.

Our eagerness to transform ourselves from the ghetto Jew to the worldly Jew has taken its toll on millions of us. Our invisibility has backfired, leaving us to the fate of so many other once great civilizations. However, we are a holy people who, like G-d, endure. It is specifically our uniqueness that keeps us alive.

A synagogue or community organization in your area is offering adult education classes in how to reconnect. Take advantage of the opportunity. Keep up with your children's Jewish education so that it can be shared between parent and child. If they are not getting a Jewish education, provide them with one. Ask a rabbi what it means to be holy: if he can't answer you, find one that can. And finally, make the Sabbath day holy, every single week. Don't make it a Jewish Sunday — keep it distinctive. Dress appropriately, eat distinctively, pray uniquely, bless your children in words and in touch, delight in the distinctive quality of your holy Jewish family and the brightness of our Jewish light will once again illuminate our lives.

The few among the many

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Fifty years ago this week, Germany surrendered to the Allies and the so-called one-thousand-year Third Reich dissolved into nothingness.

VE-Day was too late for six million Jews who had perished in the inferno of the Holocaust. But for thousands of Jews who owed their survival to gentile rescuers, VE-Day couldn't have come too soon.

It is a sombre fact, a telling commentary on mankind and Christian-Jewish relations, that the Final Solution — the Nazis' systematic extermination of European Jewry — met scarcely any resistance from non-Jewish communities.

Of the 700 million people in Nazi-occupied Europe, only a tiny fraction were involved in rescue activities. Yad Vashem, the Holocaust memorial-cum-museum in Jerusalem, has honored more than 11,000 rescuers. Perhaps there were more. But that's really not the point. The point is that righteous, courageous Christians (and Muslims) — the few among the many — came to the fore when their goodwill and assistance were most needed.

Let us be clear. Europeans who lent a helping hand risked their lives and those of their families. In October 1941, the German authorities passed an edict imposing the death penalty on "persons who knowingly provide hiding places for Jews."

The regulation was rigorously applied. Public executions conveyed the message that the Germans meant business. Nevertheless, thousands of gentiles continued to hide Jews. Hideouts ranged the gamut from attics, cellars and haystacks, to closets, monasteries and schools.

Who were the rescuers? Why and how did they do it? What problems arose?

The answers to these questions are found in three fine books — Conscience and Courage (Anchor Books, $31.95) by Eva Fogelman; The Hidden Children (Random House, $29.50) by Jane Marks; and Behind the Secret Window (McClelland & Stewart, $22.99) by Nelly Toll.

Before we proceed further, we should define our terms. According to Yad Vashem, a rescuer is someone whose deed transcended a simple act of charity. For example, a person who gave a Jew a loaf of bread or a bottle of milk is not officially considered a rescuer. Neither is it someone who saved Jews for personal gain, wished to convert their charges to Christianity or wanted to adopt a child. Finally, a rescuer is not a person who participated in Nazi activities or engaged in a last-minute mercy mission to whitewash his/her past.

However, as Fogelman notes, a handful of the rescuers may accurately be described as anti-Semites.

Stanislaw Falkowski, a parish priest from Piekuty Nowe, Poland, was one such man. Despite his sincere belief that the Jews were being rightly punished for their sins, he took in a 15-year-old Jewish boy, convinced that it was his Christian duty to "love his neighbor."

For Father Falkowski, the two concepts were not incompatible. God worked in mysterious ways. The priest never changed his views about Jews. Yet he believed that it was his obligation to conduct his life according to the Christian precepts of compassion and charity.

Of course, the vast majority of rescuers bore no ill toward Jews. Indeed, a great many of them were Judeophiles, or childhood friends of Jews. In the wake of the war, some married those whom they had saved. Some converted to Judaism. Some immigrated to Israel. Some did all three.

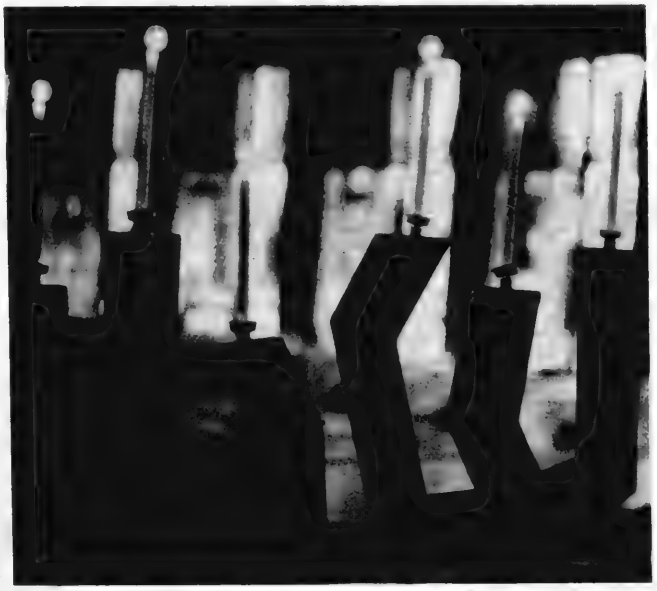
Whatever their motives, all the rescuers confronted a plethora of imponderables after making the basic decision to help. How long would the war last? Which side — Allied or Axis — would win? How long would their commitment be?

What is more, a rescuer lost any chance of preserving a normal life. Comfortable routines were upset. Husbands and wives had to give up their privacy. A careless word, a wrong move, could have severe consequences. As one Dutch rescuer put it: "The rule was: If you help Jews, you will be treated as one and sent directly to a concentration camp."

Informers were everywhere. The Nazis offered rewards for information leading to the capture of Jews. In Poland, professional blackmailers, known as szmalcowniks, extorted money and valuables by threatening to denounce their victims.

More often than not, the neighbors of rescuers resented their altruism — viewing rescuers as selfish and foolish because they endangered the lives of everyone around them.

The general rule of thumb was that the fewer people who knew, the better. One Polish rescuer, who concealed Jews in another apartment across town, did not tell his wife. He feared the knowledge would be too frightening for her to bear.



And yet, Fogelman adds, rescuers who were part of networks were better able to manage their responsibilities, fears and isolation than single individuals. In several cases, entire towns — Assisi, Italy; Le Chambon, France; and Nieuwlande, Holland — cared for Jews on the run.

Be that as it may, some Jews had a better chance of survival than others. Jewish women who could pass as Christians and possessed false identity papers were generally best off. The most difficult to place were males with strong Jewish features.

In Nazi-occupied areas, the prewar Jewish child population was about 1.6 million, writes Marks. During the Holocaust, an estimated 1.5 million were killed, leaving only six to seven per cent of them alive at the end of the war. In Poland, for children from infancy to 14, the survival rate was even lower: 0.5 per cent.

In all countries, she observes, attempts to reclaim Jewish children usually led to complicated and heart-rending reactions.

Everyone suffered — rescuers, parents and children.

In the spring of 1943, when Toll was 8 years old, her resourceful father arranged a hiding place with a Polish family, the Wojteks, in an Aryan section of Lwow. Like Anne Frank, she began keeping a diary. It inspired her to compose Behind the Secret Window, a slender volume which contains Toll's bright, adolescent drawings.

She and her mother spent 13 months with the Wojteks, usually in a locked bedroom. If danger loomed, they climbed into a little cubicle obscured by a colorful kilim rug.

Three crises shook Toll and her mother.

Following an Allied air raid, a bomb fragment pierced her mother's ankle. The Wojteks attended to the wound, but not before blaming her for getting in harm's way.

In another dark moment, the Wojteks suddenly asked them to leave. There was an emotional scene and the Wojteks relented.

The last crisis occurred on the eve of the liberation of Lwow, when Krysia Wojtek announced in an agitated voice that the words "Jews are hiding here" had been scribbled in white chalk on the kitchen door. A couple of days after she had wiped the writing off the door, three Jews from a nearby building, their heads bent, were led away by the Gestapo. A Pole had denounced them.

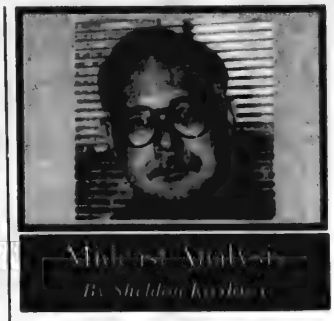
Not long afterward, the Germans were driven out of the city by the Red Army. The Tolls had survived their ordeal. A new beginning lay ahead. They left Europe and immigrated to the United States.

Whether they maintained contact with the Wojteks is unclear. In the aftermath of the war, a number of Jewish survivors kept in touch with their rescuers. But many others, eager to forget the past and get on with their lives, eventually lost contact with their rescuers.

Not surprisingly, the war affected virtually every rescuer. Fogelman believes that they, too, were victims of Nazi terror, suffering various forms of post-traumatic stress disorder.

No one, really, emerged from the Holocaust physically or mentally unscathed. But at least the rescuers could stand tall and proud. Against all odds, they had conformed to the highest norms of human behavior.

They had behaved like mentshen.



Rabin's conundrum

Do good fences make good neighbors?

Yitzhak Rabin has been struggling with that conundrum since a rash of Islamic fundamentalist suicide bombings have claimed the lives of more than 60 Israelis.

With each dreadful explosion, Rabin has been pushed further toward a policy of "separation," the sealing off of Israel's pre-1967 borders to the Palestinians of the Gaza Strip and the West Bank.

Yet Rabin is hardly enthusiastic about this Draconian solution. Separation, he realizes, goes against the grain of Labor party pragmatism. It marks a sharp departure from the objective of integrating Israel's economy with that of the West Bank and Gaza, an idea pioneered by Moshe Dayan. And it is a stinging rejection of the economic agreement signed by Israel and the PLO in 1993.

More to the point, separation plays into the hands of spoilers, spearheaded by Hamas and Islamic Jihad, who seek to wreck the prospects for peace.

These forces understand the dynamics of terrorism. By spilling Jewish blood, the Islamic fundamentalists achieve several goals. They provoke the Israeli government into collective retaliatory punishment against the Palestinians — thereby damaging the already battered peace process, bolstering Arab radicals, strengthening the Jewish settlers and their allies, impoverishing ordinary Palestinian still further, and finally, weakening Rabin and Yasser Arafat at a time when they simply cannot afford to appear ineffective.

Rabin, in particular, is sensitive to the argument that constant closures worsen conditions for Palestinian workers, who are dependent on Israel for their livelihood.

Only several years ago, upwards of 150,000 Palestinians commuted from Gaza and the West Bank to jobs in Israel. But due to the Gulf War and the worrisome upsurge of terrorism in the past two years, the number has been gradually whittled down to about 50,000. Israel has replaced the Palestinians with Asians and East Europeans.

With negligible industry in the territories, the redundant Palestinian workers have been set adrift on a sea of uncertainty and deprivation. By all accounts, the closures cost the Palestinian National Authority, based in Gaza and Jericho, about $2 million a day in lost wages, the equivalent of the funds promised by foreign donors.

Nevertheless, in order to clamp down on terrorism and to buff his image in advance of next year's general election, Rabin has more or less embraced the concept of separation.

Israel has erected an electronic fence around Gaza and has decreed it off limits to Israeli trucks. And now, Rabin is seriously thinking of creating a costly security strip, with fences and minefields, along the contours of the West Bank.

But with 120,000 Jewish settlers living cheek by jowl with a multitude of Arabs in Judea and Samaria, can separation really be considered a practical option?

EMBASSY OF ISRAEL/CJN CONTEST
'WHAT ISRAEL MEANS TO ME'

More than a symbol of Jewish faith

By JOSH LAMBERT

Josh Lambert

In the search for the meaning of the State of Israel, it is all too easy to dismiss it as a symbol of the Jewish faith. We can easily put it on the level of the star of David and the yarmulke as an emblem for Jews worldwide.

However, Israel is much more than a mere banner for the Jewish faith, just as the Torah is more than a book of commandments. In actuality, Israel not only represents the ideals of Judaism, it also protects and serves Jewish religion and culture everywhere. And as it has an everlasting role in the continuity of the Jews, its functions change with the times.

One of the defining characteristics of the State of Israel is that it is not an arbitrary land mass. The pioneers of the Jewish State rejected a Uganda settlement because it did not have the historical background of Palestine, and they were right to do so. A tree is nothing without roots, and a Jewish state in Uganda would have fallen quickly. The State of Israel, on the other hand, has survived numerous wars and thousands of terrorist attacks because of the deep-seated connection between Palestine and Judaism.

This connection is a large part of the international brotherhood felt by Jews everywhere. Jews not only have a common history, but a common home, and they are bound together by it. Jews will campaign for their brothers no matter where they live, and if need be, they will even fight for them. This kinship is a vital part of Judaism and Jewish survival in the 20th century and beyond.

As well as creating a link among Jews worldwide, the political State of Israel gives Jews a means through which they can express their brotherhood. By providing economic support and political pressure, Israel can help Jews when the international Jewish community cannot. Examples of this are abundant: Operations Exodus and Solomon are just two of the larger, more recent efforts. In this way, Israel protects Jews no matter where they live, and gives confidence even to those living in safe countries.

The relationship between the Diaspora Jewish community and Israel is hardly a one-directional one, though, and while the simple existence of the State of Israel contributes to the longevity of Jews everywhere, the opposite is not true. Jews must realize that without their active support of Israel, the relationship between the two and the individual status of each are sorely threatened. While individual Jewish communities can be counted on by Israel for millions of dollars each year, fundraising isn't nearly enough, and there is perhaps a more important focus for their efforts. Respected and politically influential Jews in free countries must be constantly reminded to lobby and campaign and use their political leverage to garner support for Israel in their governments, their media, and the global community.

In truth, Israel is no more a symbol for Judaism than a tree is a symbol for the fruit it bears. The tree and the fruit are inescapably linked, and their relationship is a complex one. Each is responsible for the continued existence of the other, and changes in either affect both. A tree has roots protecting and providing for the fruit, and branches which expand and create more space for fruit to grow. In return, the fruit provides the tree with a means of continued existence by spreading seeds. Israel and the Jews are also bound together in an eternal give-and-take. This relationship, when well protected, is not only beneficial for all, but truly a thing of beauty.

Always a special place in my heart

By NATALIE KRINSKY

Natalie Krinsky

The land of milk and honey, Canaan, Judea, Zion, Israel. Whatever it is called, Israel will always hold a special place in my heart. It is a nation of joy and unity, but most importantly, it is the Jewish homeland.

Over the years, Israel has opened its arms and heart to Jews in need from all over the world. Whether Moroccan, Iraqi, or more recently, Russian, Ethiopian and Bosnian, Israelis have fostered their fellow Jews.

To me, Israel is a second home, a place where my family can gather, be welcomed, have fun and feel loved. Israel is a place where one can experience the true meaning of klal Yisrael.

Following the Holocaust, hundreds of thousands of Jews whose families perished in death camps, came to Israel to rebuild their lives. Times were tough, but they pulled together and used their ingenuity to build a country which all Jews today can call home. Unfortunately, their struggle to survive was not over in the new country. Following the Declaration of Independence, Israel was cruelly attacked by its neighboring countries. Despite the many obstacles in its young life, Israel and Israelis have always looked positively towards the future.

Israel's long lasting desire for peace is becoming a reality. Israel and other Middle Eastern countries such as Jordan and Egypt are currently working towards a comprehensive peace in the Middle East.

Both my mother and father were born in Israel and my grandparents had settled there after the Holocaust. I have visited Israel quite a few times. Although each visit has been different, they have all been thoroughly enjoyable. Israel is a unique mix of past and present. The Western Wall and the cobblestone streets of Jerusalem, the discos on the beaches of Tel Aviv and the magnificent campuses on Mount Scopus and Ramat Aviv are woven together like a colorful batik. Each of these places holds a special memory for me.

One of my earliest childhood memories took place in Israel. I was about 3 years old. My mother and my uncle took me on a day tour to Jerusalem. One of the sights we visited was the Western Wall. My mother explained to me that it is traditional to write a wish on a piece of paper and place it in one of the gaps in the wall. I was so excited by this idea that I insisted on writing down my own note on a small piece of paper. I wished for a pink My Little Pony. A week later, when I returned to Canada, my wish was granted! I received My Little Pony as a birthday gift.

This August I will become a bat mitzvah. I have chosen to have the event in Israel. The bat mitzvah service symbolizes the progression from childhood to adulthood and it creates a strong connection with Judaism. It was always my wish to celebrate my bat mitzvah in Israel. It is an extremely special event for me and my family and I wanted to spend it in my homeland.

Israel is like a knot that ties all Jews together. I hope that Israel is as great as an inspiration to other young people as it is to me and that my generation and future generations to come will keep the flame of Judaism going, sharing in the pain and the glory of Israel as past generations have done before us. Although I am Canadian, Israel means a great deal to me. Israel is my second home.

Weizman: Together we will make Israel more attractive

On the eve of the 47th anniversary of the State of Israel, close to its half century, the message which I wish to convey to you applies basically and above all to the relations between the Jews in Israel and our brothers and sisters in the Diaspora.

Israel has made exceptional advances in science, technology, commerce and industry in this short time. The readiness of nations throughout the world to establish closer relations with us is testimony to their esteem. It stems not only from our desire for peace, love of peace and commitment to making peace, but from the courage and intellectual ability of our people.

We are living in changing times. In the process of talks with our neighbors, our progress is hampered by terrorists trying to slow rapprochement.

It is imperative that, within the next five to 10 years, our people in the Diaspora send their children here to contribute their knowledge and expertise. The significance of sons and daughters coming to Israel in large numbers to feel and breathe the atmosphere cannot be overemphasized. Israelis, on their part, will take them to their hearts.

Together we will make Israel more and more attractive to all Jews in the Diaspora and create the large Jewish centre to which we aspire. Together we will be able to advance even further Israel's scientific and technological development and deepen our understanding of our ancient Jewish culture.

The State of Israel achieved its position due to its democratic nature and the fact that its people aimed for peace and fought for it, despite all difficulties. We now call on you to stand shoulder to shoulder with us in our daily tasks in order to build a better future for the children and grandchildren of Jews everywhere.

Rabin: We are a step closer to our dream of peace

Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin's Independence Day message.

Dear Friends,

On this festive occasion of Israel's 47th Independence Day, it gives me great pleasure to extend my warmest greetings to the Jewish communities in the Diaspora and all our friends around the world. Israel is the heart of the Jewish people, and united Jerusalem forever its capital. This is a celebration not only for Israelis but for Jews everywhere.

From our very first Independence Day, when the joy of the re-establishment of the Jewish state was mingled with the sound of enemy fire and the cries of dying comrades, we have dreamed of peace. This Independence Day we are one step closer to fulfilling that dream.

This year, too, we have lost precious lives through terrorism. This year, too, we went to the military cemeteries many times. The bereaved gather more and more families into their midst, and the war is not yet over. I have no words of consolation for you, because I know well that no words can ever heal the pain and that all words lose their meaning when they meet your faces and your eyes. The pictures of those dear to you — and to us — appear before your wide-open eyes; they will forever remain young children whom we will always love.

We will continue our quest for peace, despite the terror and day-to-day difficulties, for it is the only way to bring an end to the suffering between the Israeli and Palestinian peoples. At the same time, we will fight those who fight the peace.

The barbed wire which once separated Israel and Jordan has been torn down, the mine fields have been swept clean and army binoculars have been replaced by tourists' cameras.

Peace with Jordan has paved the way for joint economic cooperation and helped strengthen our contacts with other nations in the region with whom we hope to have full diplomatic relations soon.

There is still a long way to go, however. Genuine peace cannot be achieved without cost and risks. But we know that in our effort to overcome these challenges, we have partners we can count on — you! In winning the peace, as in winning a war, we need your continued support and understanding.

There are internal struggles as well. We are still faced with the task of nation-building. We need your support to build a secure home for the Jewish people, not only against challenges on our borders and beyond, but against challenges from within. We are still absorbing the large wave of Jewish immigrants who have arrived over the last few years. We still have distressed neighborhoods and families at risk in need of special attention. We are still actively reforming our economy to enable us to compete in a dynamic, international marketplace. Israel should continue to play a central role in the life of Diaspora Jewry.

We have always talked about the partnership between Jews in Israel and the Diaspora. It is a mutual commitment. We are facing unprecedented risks — but so are you. You have stood up for Israel and the Jewish communities in Russia, Yemen, Ethiopia and Syria, when they were in danger. Now it is Israel's turn to assist the Jewish communities, in the United States and elsewhere, which are threatened, not only by anti-Semitism, but by assimilation and religious, cultural and spiritual distress. We stand by your side in this struggle, and will make every effort to aid you to overcome the dangers you face, as you previously helped our Jewish brethren around the world surmount theirs.

For thousands of years, the Jewish people has survived and flourished in the face of all dangers, against all odds, because, as it is written: "All Jews are responsible for one another." Together, we will continue the glorious pageant of Jewish history, in our homeland and wherever Jews live. Am Yisrael Chai!

Bergen-Belsen liberation marked in Victoria

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VICTORIA — The city's 50th anniversary of the liberation of the Bergen-Belsen death camp by the British army was observed here on April 15 as Bergen-Belsen Remembrance Day, but because of Passover, it was later followed by a memorial service at the Jewish Community Centre.

Peter Gary, head of the Victoria Holocaust Remembrance and Education Society and a survivor of Bergen-Belsen, and Michel Mielnicki of Vancouver both spoke of their horrifying experiences at the camp.

One of the liberators, Dr. George Woodwark, who lives on Vancouver Island, reported on what he found when he came to the camp on April 16, 1945.

Nat Lochoff, a close friend of Gary's, read from the report of the liberation by the British commander of the 102 Control Section of the 2nd Army, which took over the camp after it was surrendered by the Nazis.

The report stated that on April 12, 1945, the chief of staff of the 1st German Parachute Army approached the brigadier-general staff of the British 8th Corps. The Germans said typhus was raging at Bergen-Belsen and they couldn't, or wouldn't, cope with the situation. The Germans asked the British to "come in and take the place."

On April 13, terms of a special truce were drawn up (a battle was raging all around the Belsen area) and the British agreed to come. A neutral area was defined to allow the British to come safely.

Under the terms of the truce, the SS camp staff was to remain, "the British doing what they liked with them. Hungarians attached to the German army were also to remain, armed, and be used by the British until such time as there was no use for them."

The first British to arrive on April 15 were members of an anti-tank battery. With them was Brig. Glyn Hughes, deputy director of the medical services of the 2nd Army.

The report says, "The scene which met the first comers beggars description. There were about 50,000 people in the camp, of whom about 10,000 lay dead in the huts or about the camp. Those still alive had had no water or food for seven days, after a long period of semi-starvation. Typhus, among other diseases, was raging. There was filth everywhere ... the very air was posioned."

The Nazis, including officers and women, were put to work burying the dead. British reinforcements arrived to help move the living to four hospitals and three transit camps in the barracks' area.

The report says 28,900 were evacuated from the camp, of whom 2,006 died afterwards. The British supervised the burial of 23,000 in total. The daily death rate was "terribly high," but steadily decreased.

After making certain the living victims had been given proper medical care, and some had begun the long trek back to their homes, the British burned the camp at 6 p.m. on May 22.

At the memorial service, Martin Reynard and Marion Siegel sang concentration camp songs; appropriate poems were read by Barry Mutter; and Crystal Gary read from The Diary of Anne Frank. Rabbi Victor Reinstein led the Kaddish for the dead.

Annual Yom Hashoah services were held at the Holocaust Memorial in the Jewish Cemetery on April 23.

Canadians learn to read Hebrew

By AMY SATTIN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Many of them didn't know an aleph from a tav, but by the end of the day, close to 420 adults across Canada were reading Hebrew with confidence for the first time.

Relying on pictograms, simple riddles and familiar Hebrew words, instructors at 19 locations from Calgary to St. Catharines taught the rudiments of Hebrew literacy in under eight hours.

The April 23 program was built around the "whole word recognition" method developed by American rabbi Noah Golinkin, and promised participants a reading vocabulary of 180 words by the end of the day.

The results? Three hours into a class held at the Bloor Jewish Community Centre in Toronto — one of nine locations in the city — the 23 students were sailing briskly through the Hebrew alef-bet, sometimes overtaking instructor Lori Gershon in their enthusiasm.

"It's like watching a light turn on," said participant Zandra Brown. "It's getting brighter and brighter." Brown, a third-year sociology student at the University of Toronto, said she signed up for the $47 course to augment the Jewish history classes she is taking at the university.

Leibel Kates, another participant, expressed a desire to better read the prayer books at his Conservative synagogue, while Georgina Cannon said she had just begun exploring her Jewish background and felt Hebrew literacy was essential for "the title 'Jew' to be more than just a title."

Organizers of the program are already planning next year's event, which will be timed once again to coincide with Yom Ha'atzmaut.

"This is such an easy, open, unthreatening way to learn," beamed Rabbi Elyse Goldstein of Kolel: A Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning, a co-sponsor of the program with ARZA, the Canadian Council for Reform Judaism.

That's not to say there weren't moments of frustration. Beverly Applebaum, a grandmother who is hoping to have a bat mitzvah some day, announced she was ready to quit 45 minutes into the session.

"It's these vowels," she later admitted over lunch. "They are driving me crazy."

Harris steps down from CJC war crimes committee

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — "Am I giving up?"

Milton Harris, the man who has lobbied successive Canadian governments to prosecute war criminals, repeated the reporter's question, incredulous that it should be asked.

The question arose because Harris, 68, is stepping down as chair of the Canadian Jewish Congess war crimes committee after 12 years at the helm.

"My conscience wouldn't allow me to give up, let alone the obligation we have to the survivors in our midst. If anything, I have even more responsibility because my family is the only Jewish family I know that did not lose someone in the Holocaust."

The man who was president of Congress in 1983-86 and who put war crimes at the top of his agenda says candidly "we didn't accomplish a lot."But few will say it was for lack of trying.

Milton Harris

"It's time for some one else to take over, I haven't got very far, I'll certainly be available to help, depending on who is the new chair and whether I'm needed."

The present situation, in which the government has promised action against four alleged war criminals, sums up the frustration he has felt. "They've moved on one, they're late in taking action on the others, and we don't agree with their reasons for only taking action on four cases. The reasons they give are pure b--- s---."

On the desk of the cabinet minister involved are reports by senior officers recommending action against 12 alleged war criminals, Harris notes.

"I've been around long enough to believe it when it happens," he said.

Through the tortuous turnings and twistings of government policy on the war crimes issue, Harris says one event stands out as a landmark. "That was when [then] prime minister Brian Mulroney announced the formation of the Royal Commission on War Crimes headed by Judge Jules Deschenes which reported in 1986 leading to the War Crimes legislation in 1987. Mulroney never told me why he did it. I think it has something to do with his being shanty Irish."

Congress waged one battle after another to get the government to release parts of the Deschenes report classified as secret for security reasons. Along the way, Harris recalls, Congress learned that bureaucrats had deliberately excised parts of two international treaties on stateless persons which excepted protection for war criminals. "They wilfullly distorted those treaties so the government would have an excuse for not taking action."

Harris said he is often asked if anti-Semitism is behind the government's failure to act. "I didn't experience any anti-Semitism,"he said. "In my experience it is the failure of senior government bureaucrats to be sensitive to all sides of a situation, just as they were insensitive to the plight of Jews in the 1940s and before."

It may be, he says, that a new approach is needed on the war criminals issue. "I believed in taking a pragmatic approach, in working with government. Another approach is to continuously carp at the government's failure to act."

Harris expects to have more time now to pursue his interest in Israel, a subject on which he has been far from reticent in the past. "We're on the verge of peace there, I hope, or to a break-up which will end the chance of peace in my lifetime."

A man who believes strongly in the right of Jews to speak out openly on Israel or affairs in their own community, Harris said he is worried that young Jews "think we're a monolithic, closed community, that's not a good perception."

One thing is sure. We haven't heard the last of Milton Harris. "After all I've been active in organized Jewry for 60 years."It's true, he was president of Young Judea in London, Ontario when he was eight.

Eban says peace failure would be disastrous

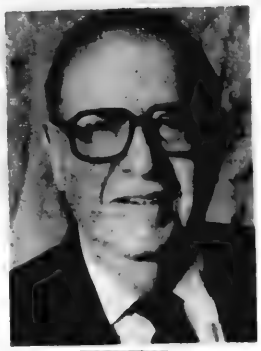
By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Israel's elder statesman, Abba Eban, issued a dire warning last week, saying that the breakdown of the current Middle East peace process would be disastrous for Israel and its Arab neighbors.

Without elaborating, Eban said that failure by the parties to reach a peaceful settlement would lead to an "inferno of hatred and antagonism."

And should this scenario unfold, he suggested, another generation may well pass before peace talks can be resumed again.

Eban, 80, delivered his remarks to an overflow audience at Holy Blossom Temple. Irving Abella, the outgoing president of the Canadian Jewish Congress, introduced him as "the voice of the Jewish people" and "a master of diplomacy and the English language."



Abba Eban

Now retired from government service, Eban was foreign minister in the 1960s and 1970s, when Israel fought two wars. He was often called to defend Israel at the United Nations, and he did so with aplomb and eloquence, in the opinion of observers.

The topic of his Gerald Schwartz/Heather Reisman lecture here was Fifty Years After The War: Personal Reflections. And while he reminisced about Israel's first decades as a sovereign state, he spoke at length about the maturity of Israel's political culture.

Declaring that it has been moving with the "spirit and impulse of the present age," Eban said Israel has learned it can no longer rule over another people — the Palestinians — without their consent.

Israel, he observed, was most "vulnerable and insecure" after the 1967 Six Day War, when it occupied an area from the Suez Canal to the Golan Heights.

During this period, Israel was "greatly overextended" and could only have maintained the status quo at an "agonizing price."

Though replete with terrorism and personal tragedies, the current Mideast peace process does not exact from Israel the kind of high casualties it sustained between 1967 and the 1973 Yom Kippur War, he said.

In a reference to Israel's smaller dimensions following withdrawals from Arab territories since the Yom Kippur War, Eban, a member of the Labor party, mused, "Do not believe that big is beautiful if [Israel] is overextended."

Looking forward, he said that Israel's task is to bring "our rights and interests" into harmony with its Arab adversaries.

And while Israelis should be inspired by the grand sweep of their history, he added, they should not be enslaved by it.

Baycrest launches largest campaign

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The largest fund-raising campaign in the history of Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care was launched at the Inn on the Park at the end of March.

The $60 million organizers hope to raise are intended for a new Jewish Home for the Aged, a Centre for Cognitive Disorders, research, the expansion and development of rehabilitation services, for community outreach and respite care, and for educational activities.

The Apotex Foundation kick-started the campaign with a $6 million donation, and the new building will be called the Apotex Centre, Jewish Home for the Aged.

The nine co-chairs, Allan Offman, Harry Gorman, Mira Koschitzky, Paul Morton, Neil Nisker, Jack Rose, Joseph Rotman, Sam Ruth, and Judy Scheininger, are all active in communal and charitable affairs.

Each of them, said campaign director Charles Diamond, has his or her particular portfolios (Nisker and Scheininger, for instance, are in charge of major gifts, while Morton and Rotman are responsible for corporate gifts), but "they all work as a team as well."

The current Jewish Home for the Aged, which opened in 1968, is completely out of date, Diamond told The CJN.

"It was built for the well elderly in their 60s and 70s. The average age now is 85, and 92 per cent need assistive devices to walk."

Because curent government policy is to keep people at home for as long as possible, Baycrest will be expanding its community outreach program, so that it will be able to service more people more effectively, Diamond added.

The Centre for Cognitive Disorders will serve those with Alzheimer's disease, strokes, Parkinson's disease, as well as other conditions which require very special kinds of treatment.

In a media release, Offman noted the obligation to protect the growing aged population.

"It is up to us to give them the best quality of life, and to help them maintain their independence and dignity."

The nine chairs and the staff of Baycrest, Diamond said, all share that vision.

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — "We just wanted to help out," explain Eitz Chaim Grade 6 students Adena Philips and Naomi Skorecki.

Touched by the story of Jay Feinberg, the 26-year-old New Jersey man fighting a battle against chronic myelogenous leukemia, Adena and Naomi organized their own drive to raise funds for bone marrow screening drives.

They bought, imprinted and sold some 500 pens, raising $1,800 for Feinberg.

They got the idea from Adena's father, Dr. Edward Philips, a Toronto dentist, who had some pens made up for him. Besides, Adena noted, pens are "something people use every day."

They found sponsors for their project by combing family phone books and shul lists for businesses and professionals who might want to help pay for the blood tests, which cost $60 each.

"We needed $400 to buy the pens," said Naomi. "But we got over $1,000, so we could get extra."

Each pink and teal pen was imprinted "Do the WRITE thing. Support JAY and other victims."

Naomi and Adena sold the pens at two dollar each at a learnathon for Feinberg, at science fairs, at school ("We did really well at lunchtime," Naomi noted), to friends and family.

Adena's father is extremely proud of the girls' achievement. "They did everything themselves. They got the sponsors, priced different companies, ordered the pens, and organized sales.

"It came from their hearts."

Reached at the headquarters of Friends of Jay in New York, Feinberg's mother Arlene said "I want those kids to know that [their concern and help] keep the smiles on my kid's face."

Her son's condition, she said, is stable. "He is holding his own — and that's another miracle."

Adena Philips (left) and Naomi Skorecki raised $1,800 for blood screening tests for Jay Feinberg and others who need bone marrow transplants.

TORONTO — It was their 25th trip to Israel but this time there was a difference. In honor of Isadore Black's 80th birthday, their four children sent him and his wife, Belle, on a holiday.

The Blacks combined it with receptions in their honor by State of Israel Bonds; the Ponevez Yeshiva, where he is a member of the board of governors; and Boy's Town Jerusalem, which they have supported for years.

A well known merchant, civic leader and Peterborough Citizen of the Year in 1991, Black has been active in the affairs of the 1,000-student yeshivah since a 1959 Israel trip. Then he discovered that his father Philip had attended the original Ponevez Yeshiva in Lithuania.

Philip Black, who died in 1941, was the first rabbi in Peterborough and served it from 1907 to 1912.

"This was the trip of my lifetime," Black told The CJN. "My greatest pleasure is to go to the early morning services at the yeshivah and face the ark which was brought from Italy 600 years ago."

Boy's Town in Jerusalem has made phenomenal strides in computer programming, Black said, citing its ability to program an ambulance ride through the city to avoid red lights.

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — On April 9, Fanny Rosenberg, one of Winnipeg's biggest wrestling fans, celebrated her 100th birthday at the Sharon Home, surrounded by family and friends.

The centenarian moved into the Jewish nursing home just two years ago, after falling in her apartment and breaking her hip.

Larry Leonoff, one of Rosenberg's five grandchildren, acted as master of ceremonies for the afternoon and spoke for the family, including her 10 great-grandchildren.

Leonoff recalled his grandmother's sandwiches — and her ceramics and pottery. He noted that she was an original member of the Golden Age Club and a longtime member of the General Monash Ladies Auxiliary (which also gave her a birthday party the Sunday before).

He explained that she is also known as Fanny Ross because she worked at the Winnipeg Winter Club at a time when no Jews were allowed in. Originally from Manchester, England, Rosenberg has a strong British accent. By changing her name to one that sounded English, she was able to get a job there in the kitchen.

Leonoff also spoke of his bubbie's love of wrestling. He remembered going to a match with her when he was 10. "She always carried a hat pin with her for possible use," he recalled. "All that jumping up and getting excited have kept her young."

Rosenberg came to Winnipeg with her family when she was 14. When out walking one day, she saw a crowd watching a wrestling match and joined in. She has been going monthly ever since.

For her 75th birthday, she was given a lifetime free seat at ringside by the World Wrestling Federation, whose members sent her a fruit basket when she was hospitalized for three months recovering from her broken hip.

At 100, her eyesight and hearing are failing somewhat, but mentally Fanny Rosenberg is still sharp as a tack.

Shul seder reaches out to those with AIDS, HIV

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

Each drop of wine we pour is hope and prayer that people will cast out the plagues that threaten everyone, everywhere they are found, beginning in our own hearts. (New Union Haggadah)

TORONTO — Over 300 people either affected or infected by HIV and AIDS gathered at Holy Blossom Temple during Passover week to celebrate the holiday at a third seder.

The fifth annual seder, which originated in 1991 with 55 people at the 519 Church St. Community Centre, is sponsored by the Holy Blossom Temple AIDS committee and the temple's brotherhood and sisterhood.

Kael Shriar, who co-chairs the AIDS committee with Marci Rose, told the crowd that he was pleased that people living with AIDS could share the seder with so many of their family, friends and caregivers.

"For me, Passover would have little meaning without this seder. Jewish tradition has it that we recount our history. We are here to remind everyone that HIV and AIDS has not faded away — people are still living with the virus. In connecting the Passover story to HIV and AIDS we hope that we do not have to go through a 40-year struggle and find that there are no survivors."

Several seder participants agreed that until they take part in this seder "Passover has not happened."

Drs. Donna and Jay Keystone led the reading of the specially-written Passover Haggadah.

"Tonight we sit at this Passover seder as a family. We are the mothers, fathers, sons, daughters and friends of different peoples, races and religions. We, the descendants of Abraham and Sarah, seek to find again the purest spirit of our heritage. Each year, the celebration of Passover demands that we become aware of injustice and oppression wherever it may exist," Jay Keystone read.

Before the traditional Passover meal provided free to everyone with a request only for donations, the seder included the audience in responsive four questions.

Why is this night different from all other nights? Because we are all here together as an affirmation of our faith and hope, despite the many differences that often keep us apart. On all other nights we may eat either leavened bread but on this night why only unleavened bread? Because tonight we remember the strains imposed upon those afflicted with AIDS, the strains that may prevent them from doing things in their own time. . . .

When the children had found the afikoman and Cantor Benjamin Maissner had led the blessings after the meal, the Keystones concluded with the hope that "next year we'll sit on the porch and count migrating birds. Children on vacation will play tag between the house and the fields. You will yet see, you will yet see how good it will be next year."

Holy Blossom, currently the only synagogue in Toronto to have formed a specifically Jewish response to HIV/AIDS, acknowledged the many corporate contributions, as well as Temple Emanu-El, Temple Har Zion, Temple Kol Ami, Temple Sinai and "our many friends in the community at large."

Gymnast captures second place

Gerson snagged the prestigious silver medal based on his performance in five disciplines. He finished first in rings, third in high-bar, fourth in pommel horse, sixth in floor exercises and eighth in parallel bars.

Gerson, who was part of Ontario's gold medal team at this year's Canada Winter Games, will compete in the national championships in Vancouver, which begin on May 24.

New Reena facility gets underway

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

VAUGHAN — Ground was broken here April 23 for the Reena Foundation's long-awaited Toby and Henry Battle Developmental Centre, touted as the first facility of its kind in North America.

Slated to open next year, the $6.2 million centre will offer daytime social and recreational activities for some 200 developmentally handicapped adults.

The 45,000-square-foot facility will feature a gymnasium, creative arts, audio-visual and computer workshops, a library, greenhouse and dining room, as well as activities tailored to individual skills and interests. Plans also call for a "wellness centre" to provide access to professional support, therapy and counselling.

The centre, to be located on Clark Avenue just west of Bathurst Street, next door to the planned Aish HaTorah campus, will be open to everyone. All programs will be run in a Jewish environment. Organizers say it will provide much-needed relief for caregivers seeking day programs.

Activities will be available five days a week, as well as evenings and weekends.

The centre will be Reena's first foray beyond the boundaries of Metro Toronto, those attending the groundbreaking were told.

More than 2,500 adults with developmental handicaps in the greater Metro area and York Region are on waiting lists for day services, and Reena alone has a waiting list of 200, said Reena chair Robert Berkovitz.

On hand for the sod turning were Vaughan Mayor Lorna Jackson; all members of Vaughan's council; York North Liberal MP Maurizio Bevilacqua; and members of the Battle family. Also present was a planner from the Israeli city of Ramlah, which twinned with Vaughan two years ago.

Greetings were also brought by Rabbi Baruch Taub of the nearby Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto Congregation and from Rabbi Joseph Kelman, who helped found Reena over 20 years ago.

The centre will exist thanks to a bequest from the late Toby and Henry Battle, whose daughters Miriam and Sarah were developmentally handicapped.

At the Battle Centre sod turning were (from left) Reena chair Robert Berkovitz; Battle advisory board co-chair Susan Rober; Reena director Sandy Kesheu; Vaughan Mayor Lorna Jackson, Reena Foundation chair Ron Hoffman; Battle family member David Segar; capital campaign chair Tom Ungar; and Reena clients Edna Marcus and Helen Handler. Israelis get help with family planning

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It's not uncommon for SHILO, the only comprehensive family planning organization in Jerusalem, to step in where too many Israeli doctors leave off.

"It drives me crazy," said Joanne Zack-Pakes, director of SHILO.

The 44-year-old Vancouver-born social worker was in Canada recently to attend a conference on adolescent health in Vancouver and meet with local supporters there and in Toronto. She described a typical Israeli scenario during a Toronto interview: "The doctor feels he's done a great job by getting [a teenage girl] on the pill; meanwhile the prescription's in the wastebasket. She doesn't want her mother or little brother to find the pills. He hasn't counselled her."

SHILO, a non-profit organization established in 1976, recently won an award of merit from Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Olmert's office for outstanding volunteer work.

The organization is best known in Israel for serving adolescents. Some of its clients are as young as 13, but the door is open to people of all ages and backgrounds.

SHILO serves about 1,000 clients every year and reaches another 3,500 people through its educational programs.

Joanne Zack-Pakes

Zack-Pakes, who moved to Israel in 1969, has been with the organization since she joined as a volunteer in 1980, a year before completing her degree in Social Work at Bar-Ilan University.

SHILO's annual budget of $150,000 (U.S.) funds a small core of paid staff and a variety of projects, including training of professionals.

Resources are stretched to the extent that Zack-Pakes has on occasion gone without pay, she said. Budget sources include private donations, the New Israel Fund, the Jerusalem Foundation, and the Jewish Agency, which funded an outreach project for Soviet olim for three years.

The outreach project, which began in 1991, was designed to educate olim on alternatives to abortion, "the main family planning method" in the former Soviet Union. SHILO has four Russian-speaking counsellors.

Under Israeli law, abortion is legal for women under 17 or over age 40, for women who become pregnant outside of marriage, if a fetus fails to develop normally, or if a married woman has physical or mental health reasons. Abortions must be approved by a hospital committee.

While the law is "quite liberal," Israel is still a very "pro-natal society," noted Zack-Pakes. Aside from the distribution of right-to-life pamphlets and having its modest sign removed on occasion, SHILO coexists peacefully with its neighbors, she said.

"We don't get flak from the Orthodox. Abortion is legal [in Israel], and it's all according to Halachah."

In fact, one of the gynecologists who volunteers at SHILO is a kippah-wearing Orthodox male who is "the best," said Zack-Pakes.

Sensitivity to cultural differences is important at SHILO. While Israelis generally are comfortable talking openly about sexuality with a counsellor, Russian olim haven't been. Young Russian women, however, are more likely to confide in their mothers about their sexual relationships, Zack-Pakes has found.

For that reason, counselling in the Russian community has focused on information-giving, and young clients are asked about their home environment.

SHILO's newest outreach project is aimed at young married women living in low-income areas, some of whom are survivors of domestic abuse. For this effort, the organization has teamed up with WIZO and with a shelter for battered women. The project will focus on education about reproductive health, including issues such as how to be assertive with a gynecologist.

The project has private funding to carry it through the summer only, and a funding application has been made to the government. "I can't not do it, because I know the need is there," said Zack-Pakes.

Community awards

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Two prominent, active community leaders will be the first recipients of the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council's (WJCC) newest awards.

Marjorie Blankstein and David Kaufman will be presented respectively with the Sol Kanee Distinguished Community Service Medal and the Max Shore Memorial Award during the WJCC's annual general meeting on May 16 at the Shaarey Zedek Synagogue. The Keynote speaker will be Charles Bronfman.

The Max Shore Memorial Award recognizes longstanding leadership and dedication to the Combined Jewish Appeal (CJA). Kaufman, the last president of the old Jewish Welfare Fund in 1971, was instrumental in the formation of its successor, the WJCC, in 1972.

The Sol Kanee Award recognizes outstanding leadership and dedication to the Jewish community and there is no one in Winnipeg who can match the range of involvement of Marjorie Blankstein.

Currently vice-president of the Jewish Community Campus of Winnipeg and chair of its Capital Campaign, she has served in a leadership role in numerous community, national and women's Jewish organizations, as well as several general community non-profit organizations.

Healing light from Israel

Avroom Medical is introducing two revolutionary products from Israel to Canada. Since 1992, thousands of people around the world have been using BioBeam light to treat and alleviate pain linked with rheumatological diseases and wound healing.

Commonly known as "soft" or "cold" laser light, BioBeam is a narrow band low power light concentrated around specific wavelengths. It stimulates and accelerates healing at the cellular level, and relieves pain associated with inflammation, without producing heat or UV rays.

At present, 50,000 BioBeam machines are in use world-wide. Although the technique has been known to medical practitioners for some time, Avroom Medical is pioneering a consumer model for home use in Canada.

BioBeam 660 is effective in treating acne, cold sores (herpes), bed sores, canker sores, and and skin ulcers associated with diabetes, and speeds up the healing of post-operative wounds. BioBeam 940 alleviates rheumatic and rheumatoid arthritis pains in small joints such as fingers, hands and knees.

BioBeam is safe and easy to use. You can try it free (shipping and handling costs not included), on a "no-risk" basis for 45 days. For professionals, a larger, more powerful model will shortly be available.

BioBeam is manufactured in Tel Aviv, Israel, by Amcor, Israel's leading appliance manufacturer, and distributed in Canada by Toronto-based Avroom Medical. For more information, please contact Avroom Medical, 3200 Dufferin St., Suite 205, North York, Ontario M6A 2T3; or call toll free 1-800-324-8181.

The Perfect Solution

Families of seniors who live at home, yet cannot stay alone, have found the perfect solution at The Silver Fox Club, a daycare facility for seniors.

Opened since the fall, The Silver Fox Club, provides transportation (in North York as well as north of Steeles), meals and entertainment for as many hours per day and as many days a week as needed. "Our hours are completely flexible. We are open from 8 a.m. to 10 p.m., seven days a week so clients can choose any amount of time, depending on their needs. The introductory price is only $6.50 per hour inclusive," says co-owner Shlomo Fishman.

The Silver Fox Club provides an active environment in a homey atmosphere for those in need of assistance on a daily basis, as well as individuals with cognitive impairment. "We offer music, games, cards, movies and more for a multilingual clientele".

"It does people a world of good to get out, keep busy and socialize with others", says co-owner Frida Barak, R.N. "The Silver Fox Club is also an affordable temporary solution for those on a waiting list for a nursing home and we have an individual approach to each client.

The facility also provides help to caregivers who can go to work without worrying or just get some needed relief.

The Healing Beam of Light from ISRAEL

Acumed: Pain relieving device -for home use!

For thousands of years, mankind has turned to the mysteries of acupuncture to relieve a wide variety of pains. Today, modern science has unravelled the mystery. Endorphins, the internal morphines our own bodies produce, are released when the accupuncturist's needles touch the right points on the nerves.

The Acuhealth neurostimulator is a new product that offers the benefits of acupuncture without needles. Your days of suffering from debilitating headaches, migraines, arthritis, low back pain, fibromyalgia or a host of other ailments could be over.

The Acuhealth neurostimulator is a portable self-help device that may be conveniently applied anywhere, and is specifically designed to manage long-term chronic pain.

Based on the principles of acupuncture, the hand-held, battery-operated device electronically locates acupoints, precisely and accurately. Once the acupoint is located, a safe electrical impulse is delivered to trigger the release of the body's endorphins, giving you extended, non-toxic relief from pain. Treatment is non-invasive, non-addictive and versatile.

A comprehensive manual and instruction video are provided with Acuhealth, to help patients and caregivers locate the correct series of points for different painful conditions.

The Acuhealth unit is government-tested, and has prescription status for reimbursement from private health insurance, Workers' Compensation and Veterans' Affairs Canada. DVA TAPS Cards accepted. For more information, call 1-800-567-7246.

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

Visitors were overcome with emotion during visit to Auschwitz.

There he was, attempting to photograph a group of young people huddled together on open ground facing a mound consisting of human ash mixed with sand. They were sobbing uncontrollably and Bareket too was overcome by the knowledge that before them were the last remains of hundreds of Jewish victims of the Holocaust.

"I was just sobbing," Bareket recalled. "I had to remind myself I was there to document it."

Bareket snapped the picture and the result is one of the more powerful and moving images now on display in the Loggia Gallery in the Koffler Centre of the Arts, 4588 Bathurst St.

Titled simply A photographic narrative of the March of the Living 1994, Bareket's exhibit includes 46 black and white images selected from the more than 1,500 he shot in last year's mission to Poland and Israel. The photos are accompanied by written excerpts from the journals kept by the student marchers.

Together they form a powerful record of the intense emotions generated by the visit to Auschwitz, Majdanek, Treblinka, the Plaszow concentration camp and Warsaw.

Employing the stark grittiness of black and white and infrared film, Bareket records the remaining on-site evidence of the Nazi program of genocide and the young people's reaction to it. In one, a young woman sits in a barn-like barrack, contemplating a massive, haphazard collection of shoes the Nazis stripped from their Jewish victims.

Innocent victims

In another, a group is seen walking through a bleak, cement-walled room. Above them are rows of shower heads.

Bareket said the idea to document the March of the Living had been brewing in his mind for two years. "My intention was to see the interaction of the young people to the sites, the concentration camps. This is the last generation who are directly connected to the people who were in the camps, their grandparents. That's why it is important to document it."

Much of Bareket's extended family were killed in the Holocaust. His father, however, left Poland in 1919 and Bareket was born in Israel.

While he had been harboring the desire to document the March for some time, the visit to the Polish sites only served to reinforce the lessons of the Holocaust.

"There in the camps it became clear to me that it was something I didn't want to forget. We should commemorate it and always remember it so it cannot happen again. Unfortunately, the human race doesn't remember well enough when I see what is happening in Rwanda and Yugoslavia."

Bareket said after the exhibit concludes its run at the Koffler Gallery (April 30 to June 9) he hopes to take it across Canada to both Jewish and non-Jewish venues.

The exhibit is co-sponsored by the United Israel Appeal of Canada and the March of the Living (Canada).

Canadian Jews to extend greetings to Israel

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Jewish community in four Canadian cities — Vancouver, Edmonton, Toronto and Montreal — will be among many worldwide that will extend televised greetings to Israel on the 47th anniversary of its statehood this week.

On Yom Ha'atzmaut, Israel's public television station (Channel 1) will have 24 hours of special broadcasting. Programming for the day typically includes Israeli music, an interview with the prime minister, Israeli movies and reminiscences about Israel's War of Independence, said Herzl Makov, Montreal-based World Zionist representative to Canada.

This year, for the first time, the Jewish Agency put out a call to its shlichim around the world asking for brief videotaped greetings to be broadcast at intervals throughout the day. Makov coordinated the project for Canada and arranged the local video in Montreal.

In Toronto, Tami Savion of the Israel Youth Program Centre arranged greetings from young and old.

The Chai Dancers, an Israeli dance group which meets twice weekly at the Bathurst Jewish Centre under the direction of Temi Kernerman, consists of about 15 energetic women in their 60s, 70s and 80s. Their spokesperson Vi Wolf extends wishes for peace and happiness after a spirited performance to Sisu Et Yerushalayim.

Girls and boys from Toronto's Bialik Hebrew Day School, under the direction of choreographer Rivka Atzmony and musical director Doron Ophir, also perform. The Bialik School Chorus sings Shalom Al Yisrael, punctuated by greetings such as Yom Hooledet Sameach, Medinat Yisrael (Happy Birthday, Israel), and the dancers, in Israeli costumes, dance a horah.

Vancouver's Maimonides High School offers greetings in both Hebrew and English. From Edmonton, grades 7 and 8 boys at Menorah Academy and Grade 6 students at Talmud Torah extend greetings in Hebrew.

Music festival in Tanglewood

By GERRY MORRIS
Special to The CJN

LENNOX, Mass. — Tanglewood, featuring the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has been one of the most eminent summer music festivals in the United States for over 50 years. It dwarfs in popularity the Philadelphia Orchestra in Saratoga, N.Y. and the Chicago Symphony at Ravinia in Chicago.

Tanglewood offers grace, tradition and magnificent music amidst the serene, enchanting beauty of the Berkshire hills. Each summer, in the splendor of this western Massachusetts cultural retreat (90 miles from Albany, N.Y.), 350,000 listeners enter the Serge Koussevitzky (Tanglewood's first Music Director) Music Shed for symphonic and chamber offerings, by one of the world's greatest orchestras, with first rate soloists.

Many come for picnics on the 500-acre grounds. Up to 12,000 listen beneath the stars to the music from the 5,000-seat shed.

Among the performmers during the seven-week 1995 season are pianists André Watts, Emanuel Ax, Yefim Bronfman, Peter Serkin, Keith Jarrett; violinist Itzhak Perlman; cellist Yo Yo Ma; conductors Seiji Ozawa (Music Director), André Previn, John Williams, Pinchas Zuckerman, Neville Marriner and TSO's current conductor, Jukka-Pekka Saraste.

This season Tanglewood Festival Chorus celebrates its 25th anniversary with two major works; Berlioz's Requiem and Mahler's Symphony No. 2 (Resurrection) to mark the 50th anniversary of the end of World War II.

The new $10-million 1,200-seat Seiji Ozawa Chamber Concert Hall will feature such artists as the Beaux Arts Trio (celebrating their 40th anniversary at Tanglewood); The Boston Camerata; The Emerson String Quartet; and the King's Singers.

The annual Jazz Festival will take place Labor Day weekend and will include Shirley Horn, Diane Schuur and Tony Bennett.

For brochure and further information, call Boston Symphony Orchestra 617-266-1492 or the Lenox Chamber of Commerce 413-637-3646.

Travel Talk

by Bill Gladstone

My Russian cousin, Bella Ginsbourg, knew the unknown faces in the old family photographs I sent her, and the unknown fate of our ancestral shtetl. "All Jews were executed in Zhlobin on April 12, 1942, on the first day of Pesach," she reported. "They were buried in a mass grave and now there is a monument there." Her own parents had survived because her grandparents had left Zhlobin for Leningrad just after the revolution "in order to give the children a proper education." Before the German siege of Leningrad, they moved to Novo Sibersk, Siberia.

Ginsbourg wrote that circumstances were forcing her and and her husband to leave the country, along with many of their Jewish friends. In their early 60s, with only a few years standing between them and their retirement pensions, they felt too old to start a new life elsewhere — but what choice did they have? Their son and his family were living in a transit camp in Italy; perhaps they would go to Israel, perhaps Germany to be near their son.

Upon investigation, the Ginsbourgs found immigration to Canada was not a feasible option for them. However, members of our Canadian mishpoche set up a fund to help them financially.

Upon visiting Israel, the Ginsbourgs were repeatedly advised against making aliyah because of the difficulties in finding jobs and affordable housing. So they chose Germany. Their next letter, postmarked from Dillenburg in the German Republic, was an unhappy one. Although officials had assured them there was a Jewish community in a nearby town, upon arrival they found that no Jews lived in either city. They spent the first night in a bad hotel and in the morning contacted the closest Jewish community, which offered no assistance.

"We found it very hard to get an apartment, since no one wanted to rent to us. We found that everything we heard in Russia about how Germans want to take in Russian emigrants was wrong. Nobody needs us here." Living on social assistance, they found even a visit to their children and grandchildren beyond their means.

After eight miserable months, they emigrated to Israel. Their next letter was postmarked from Bat Yam, the Tel Aviv suburb where they had settled into an apartment. Life was a bit easier but still no bed of roses, they wrote; somewhat stoically, they didn't elaborate on their complaints. In their last letter more than a year ago, they expressed the opinion that the political uncertainty in their Soviet homeland had robbed them of the tranquillity they had hoped for in their remaining years.

Isaac Rutman, a previously unknown cousin in Kiev, wrote to me three years ago after hearing about his Canadian relatives from the Ginsbourgs. Rutman sent an extensive family chart showing which relatives had survived the Holocaust and indicating branches in Dniepepretrovsk, Riga and Moldova. He also described two aunts who went to America before the war. Using information supplied from both Kiev and Toronto, I tracked down his first cousin in Brooklyn and sent him the address. In a subsequent letter, Rutman reported that his wife had developed cancer, probably in reaction to the Chernobyl disaster.

In his last letter about six months ago, Rutman related that things in Ukraine were going from bad to worse, economically and otherwise, and that he was going to Germany. All I could do was wish him luck. Canadian Jews have been infinitely more fortunate than our ex- Soviet counterparts. It's easy to offer advice, easy to judge — and easy to forget that, but for the grace of God, we might now be in their tired and travel-worn shoes.

Beth Tzedec art exhibition examines the Holocaust

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — In commemoration of Yom Hashoah, the Beth Tzedec Synagogue's Reuben and Helene Dennis Museum is presenting a contemporary art exhibit on the theme of the Holocaust by artist and printmaker, Sharon Merkur.

The exhibit, Borrowed Memories, is an expression of the artist's feelings about the Holocaust. The work is distinguished by Merkur's innate sense of design and color.

"The mixed media works of Borrowed Memories, while expressed in unusually bright colors, arouse an unsettling, emotional response," says Dorion Liebgott, the museum's curator. "They touch on the dissonance between the horrors of the Holocaust, and the beauty of the natural world — a graphic reflection of the banality of evil."

The works leave the viewer to discover the artist's understated message. "The horrors of the Holocaust have rarely been interpreted in such a skillfully subtle and evocative manner," explains Liebgott.

Merkur graduated from the Ontario College of Art and studied Fine Arts at York University. Her works can be found in collections across Canada, the United States, Israel and Germany.

Merkur feels strongly about her family's Polish roots. Her parents and grandparents emigrated from Poland in the 1920s. She says, "Perhaps it was inevitable that the Holocaust would resonate in me. There, but for the grace of God go I."

She says she had considered doing some works related to the Holocaust, "but I was held back by fear of hubris, chutzpa, that I, who grew up in a comfortable loving environment, with a family of parents, siblings, aunts, uncles, cousins all safe in Canada, could or would say anything."

Travelling frequently to Israel to visit her daughter, son-in-law and four grandchildren, Merkur visits Yad Vashem, the Museum of the Holocaust.

On her last visit, in the gallery's children's art section, a biographical note caught her attention, "born February 1932" — the same as Merkur's birthday — but that child had been murdered at the age of 12.

"As I exited into the brilliant sunlight that sizzled in the intense Mediterranean sky, the dissonance between the horrors of the Holocaust and the splendor of the season reminded me that the sun shone on murderers, and stars twinkled above smoke stacks. This simplistic juxtaposing of beauty and malevolence stirred a deeply felt emotion."

She said the survivors, the true witnesses, are aging and dying. "I realized that if I let my feelings of inadequacy prevent me from addressing the various issues involved, then to paraphrase — if not me, who, and if now now, when? I had reconciled my pursuit of Borrowed Memories."

VE-Day & Yom Ha'atzmaut

WWII marked turning point

Canadian society was shaken to its roots

By IRVING ABELLA

For Canadian Jews, World War II was a watershed.

On one side stood a Canada that was insular, xenophobic and nativist; a Canada permeated with anti-Semitism and racism; a Canada that stood in the forefront of the countries of the world refusing to rescue Jewish refugees from Nazi Germany and apparently proud of it.

On the other side stood a more familiar Canada — at least to us today — a Canada whose watchwords are decency and tolerance, whose goals are equality and fairness; a Canada that has opened itself up to the rest of the world; a Canada which celebrates differences and tries, often clumsily, but nevertheless with determination, to accommodate as many diversities as possible.

But of course Canadian Jews 50 years ago knew only of one Canada — a Canada that had imposed on them quotas and restrictions, limited their access to universities and professional schools, closed to them many of its resorts and beaches, and prevented an entire generation of young Jews from playing their role in Canadian society.

But these Jews also knew that Canada was their country, that it had provided them, though not many of their relatives stranded in Europe, with a home. Uncomfortable as their home was, it was still far better than the one they had left behind in the old country.

Thus, in inordinate numbers, when Canada marched off to war in 1939, so did its young Jews. No community contributed as high a percentage of its members to the Canadian Armed Forces as did the Jewish community. And no soldiers fought more bravely and with more conviction for the defence of Canada.

The Jews of the time took great pride in the achievements and heroism of their military heroes: Flight Lieut. Sydney Shulemson of Montreal, winner of the Distinguished Flying Cross; Maj. Ben Dunkelman of Toronto; Wing Cmdr. Max Smith of Winnipeg; Col. Mervyn Mirsky of Ottawa; and the 17,000 others who enlisted.

And while their boys were overseas, Jewish women played their roles. For the first time, many joined the paid work force to fill the void left by those serving in the armed forces. Many women had been forced to slave in sweat shops in the garment industry. Now with labor at a premium, most restrictions were lifted; women could work almost anywhere. Jewish women could now become nurses; they could work in the munitions industry, for the government and in banks; and they could finally stand behind a counter at Eatons. And many did.

Throughout the country, Jewish organizations mobilized in support of the war, large amounts of money were raised, centres were built for off-duty soldiers and thousands of servicemen, both Canadian and those from other countries training in Canada, were fed and looked after.

And in return, the Canadian government closed its doors even tighter to the desperate Jews attempting to flee the Nazis. In the five years of war, fewer than 500 Jewish refugees were allowed into this country.

But VE-Day changed eveything. Out of the ashes of war a new Canada was born; new leaders with new ideas and an expanded vision of the country's future began moving into positions of power. Canada's hour of opportunity had arrived. With much of the world devastated, Canada was on the brink of becoming a real world power. All she needed was more people. And so the immigration doors were flung open and over the next decade or so, millions passed through, including thousands of Jews, most of them survivors of the death camps.

The all-enveloping blanket of anti-Semitism slowly but inexorably began to lift. Shocked by the horrors of the Holocaust and perhaps by their own government's complicity, and caught up in the dramatic struggle of the plucky, beleaguered Jews in Palestine to create their own state, many Canadians became more sensitive to the needs of their Jewish citizens and more sympathetic to their goals.

Out of the war as well, a new Jewish community was being created. Though traumatized by what had happened to their kin in Europe, they were also inspired by the exploits of their soldiers and of the success of the brand new State of Israel.

Canadian Jews were no longer prepared to turn the other cheek. When Jews were barred from a Toronto skating rink, a Laurentian resort, a Manitoba beach and various medical schools, the community reacted. When Jewish veterans, despite their sacrifice for their country, were refused jobs and accommodations, the community no longer found itself alone.

Various political leaders and organizations took up the Jewish cause, and with the support of young, dedicated officials from the Jewish Labor Committee and the Canadian Jewish Congress, the barriers were blasted away.

Politicians and judges, newly sensitized, passed anti-discrimination legislation and created the first human rights commissions. Energized by a newly emboldened Canadian Jewry, Canadian society was shaken to its roots. Orchestrated by a creative, dynamic group of Jewish activists, the campaign to obliterate racism and hatred swept the country, succeeding in most places, failing — but only temporarily — in others. Finally narrow-mindedness was beginning to give way to generosity, contempt to respect, bigotry to tolerance.

This was Canadian Jewry's greatest gift to this country. It is a gift — symbolized by the Charter of Rights and by multiculturalism — that Canadians still savor.

Funny, bittersweet memories

By JACK CHISVIN

During the war, service in the Canadian Officers Training Corps was mandatory for all male university students.

When spring studies ended, we were posted to a military base for advanced training. On VE Day I was deep in Manitoba gumbo behind a transit, surveying a field near Winnipeg.

VE-Day notwithstanding, I was assigned to Camp Shilo for the summer. I was ordered to report at the train station the next day in full battle dress, including a previously issued rifle.

In an ill-fitting uniform with a tin helmet on my head, a rifle across my shoulder, a knapsack on my back and dragging a duffle bag, I walked to the bus stop on my way to the railway station. My mother accompanied me, holding on to me protectively. As the bus took off I could see her, crying, chasing the bus down the street, shedding the tears of every mother who had ever sent a son off to war.

This funny bitter-sweet memory of my mother has not faded with time.

VE-Day/ Yom Ha'atzmaut

Significant Jewish presence in military

By JANICE ROSEN

Travelling on a Toronto-bound train in the spring of 1941, newly-appointed Jewish army chaplain Rabbi Gershon Levi overheard a conversation which illustrated the all-too-familiar perception of Jews as not involved in fighting the war.

" 'And all those healthy-looking young men in civvies, why didn't they join up? And where are the Jews?' Suddenly the speaker looked across at me. 'What do you think, padre?' He seemed to think he could assume that I was not a Jew, since I was in uniform, so there was no risk of embarrassment.

"Somehow, both isolationists and patriots in the general population took it for granted that Jews were not enlisting in the armed forces, at a time when enlistment was still completely voluntary."

With the benefit of hindsight, and after five years spent compiling a nominal roll of Jewish servicemen, Rabbi Levi would be able to refute his travelling companions' assumptions with some dramatic figures.

Indeed, as Irving Abella noted in his 1990 book, A Coat of Many Colors: "As in the First World War, Jewish enrolment in the armed forces was among the highest per capita of any group in the country. Seventeen thousand joined up — about 50 per cent of those eligible for military service — and hundreds were decorated for bravery."

There has been a significant Jewish presence in the armed forces thoughout Canadian history. Our community's pioneer of Jewish demographics, Louis Rosenberg has noted: "Curiously enough, although Jews are traditionally a peaceful people, Jews were identified with military and naval affairs in the early years of their settlement in Canada to a much greater extent than the small number of Jews in 18th-century Canada would have led one to expect."

Canadian Jewish military history begins with the famous "first Jewish settler in Quebec," Aaron Hart, an officer in the British army at the time of the conquest of New France.

As well, Alexander Schomberg, captain of the frigate Diana under General James Wolfe, was born of Jewish parents.

At the time of the war of 1812, most of the Jews then in Canada held commissions in the militia, including four of the sons of Aaron Hart. During the rebellion of 1837-38, Jews rallied to the Loyalist side, again with many serving as officers in the militia.

In 1939, Louis Rosenberg had great difficulty in finding accurate records of the number of Jews who served in World War I. His considered estimate, based on Canadian and British sources, was that there were 4,695 Jews in the Canadian Expeditionary Force, out of a total Jewish population of slightly over 75,681.

Two years later, Rabbi Levi again found it no easy task to compile his exhaustive nominal roll during World War II. His book Breaking New Ground: the struggle for a Jewish chaplaincy in Canada (published by the CJC National Archives in 1994) contains details of his work, as he tracked down Jewish-sounding names among all branches of the service and followed up his guesses with direct contacts. His research, as well as that of the Canadian Jewish Congress War Efforts Department, eventually confirmed the presence of a total Jewish enlistment of 16,559 men and women, including 7494 in the army, and 5772 in the RCAF. In all, 9.8 per cent of the Jewish population of 168,367 in Canada at the time was in the military. Of this number, there were 703 casualties.

In eventual acknowledgment of the high rate of Jewish enlistment, the Canadian Army authorized 16 posts for Jewish chaplains, or roughly one chaplain per 1,000 military personnel. Duties of the chaplains included personal counselling, direction and administration of work done by part-time chaplains, volunteer rabbis on behalf of Jewish servicemen, contact with National Defence Headquarters on all matters affecting Jewish service personnel and administrative work such as keeping nominal rolls and records, distributing religious literature and corresponding with isolated units and individuals.

Besides the Congress archival records, David Rome's Canadian Jews in World War II, published in 1948 when he was press officer, also contains a brief biography and often a photograph of those who were decorated or killed in service.

The story of Jewish participation in the campaign that led to VE-Day must also include those who served in other Allied armies before immigrating to Canada. Although exact figures are difficult to trace, compiled information is beginning to be published, as for example a recent book issued in Polish listing the names of at least 63 Jews who gave their lives serving in the 1st Armored Division under the 1st Canadian Army.

And there is still much to be discovered in the histories of those who fought.

Celebrations in Picadilly Circus

By RUTH GOLDSMITH

I'll never forget my first kiss. My older sister Muriel and I were in Picadilly Circus in London, England. Two shabby schoolgirls in our frumpy war-worn clothes, we splurged a week's pocket money to take the tube (subway) to central London to celebrate VE-Day.

We yelled, we cheered, we danced and we each got our first kiss. Mine was from a doughboy, an American soldier. My sister chose a Yankee sailor with a Popeye hat and bell-bottomed trousers.

Both avid Socialists, we cheered our Conservative Prime Minister Winnie (Winston) Churchill and Foreign Secretary Anthony Eden. Avowed anti-imperialists, we yelled like maniacs when King George VI and the Queen, with their little girls Elizabeth and Margaret Rose, appeared on the balcony at Buckingham Palace.

Ruth Goldsmith 50 years ago.

Muriel in Boughton in 1941.

As a finale we caught the last tube train home, so crowded that many of the females ended up on the laps of the beaming males, who had grabbed most of the seats. Not very elegant, but the greatest time I'd ever had!

The excitement blotted out the horrors of the newsreel I'd seen a few weeks before, with walking Jewish skeletons being liberated from Bergen-Belsen by the British.

I forgot the five years of food and fuel shortages, the Blitz, the doodlebugs and V-2 rockets that had been showered on London for years. For now, life was beautiful; we all loved one another; we had hope and innocence. We knew now the war was over, life was going to be wonderful for everyone. We would all help each other, just as we had during the war.

How I miss those long-lost illusions!

It was business as usual in Victoria

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

It was business as usual at the Patricia Bay RCAF station (now the Victoria International Airport) on VE-Day.

I was perched on the stern of the RCAF twin-engine cabin cruiser adjusting the Union Jack — this was long before the Maple Leaf came into being. We were part of an air-sea rescue unit, whose job was to patrol the waters around Patricia Bay, about 25 miles north of Victoria.

Patricia Bay was an operational training station where graduates of the Commonwealth air schools from all over Canada gathered after graduation to form crews and learn how to handle the "big ones," the bomber planes or the speedy fighters. Often, they crashed into the water on takeoff or landing and it was our job to help them — or sometimes to pick up bodies.

We all knew the war in Europe was coming to an end, because Lorne Greene had told us so in the 10 p.m. national radio broadcast the night before (no CNN or TV in those days), but there was almost no celebration on the station because we regretted that we would not have a chance to serve in Europe after waiting in Canada for three years, and because we had heard the Japanese would not surrender.

The fly boys were practising as usual and we had no emergencies to handle. Then our flight-sergeant told us it was now official — the war was over. I tuned on the radio

We came face to face with grim reality of situation

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

As the whole world celebrated VE-Day, for Peter Silverman, David Smuschkowitz and Peter Smuszkowicz, former members of the Spartak Brigade, an elite partisan unit that tormented the German army for more than two years during World War II, there was no celebration — they were in emotional shock.

"We remaining Jews from Jody and vicinity were devastated," says Silverman. "During the war, we expected to be killed, but after, we found that we lived but so many others didn't live. Now we were face to face with the grim reality of our situation. We looked at our past and saw nothing but nightmares. We looked at our present and saw despair and heartbreak. We looked at our future and saw hopelessness."

They had heard on Russian BBC radio in Polish that the Nazis had surrendered. As Jewish anti-Nazi armed resistance fighters, they had been liberated before VE-Day by the Russian army in July 1944. During the 10 months to VE-Day they joined the Red Army and continued in a special search and destroy unit seeking former Nazis and collaborators.

Peter Silverman on Liberation Day, July 1944.

"We remembered the vow we made on the graves of our fallen comrades, friends and relatives, to make every effort to get some measure of justice against those who betrayed and killed Jews," says Silverman.

In a book by the three resistance fighters titled, From Victims to Victors, they tell of their two years in the forest near Vilna thwarting the Nazi's goal. Their brigade derailed German troops and trains, attacked police and soldiers, and went after informers and collaborators. Silverman and Smuschkowitz led a strike unit against known murderers and betrayers.

The three partisans supported two Jewish camps in the forest for those who were too young, too old, too weak or to sick to join the partisans.

"Thanks to the partisan group, the Jewish fighters were able to save 80 Jews in the forest," says Silverman. Twice the Germans came with tremendous force — tanks, artillery and aircraft, to clear the forest, but most were able to escape the blockade.

"To be killed was nothing," he told The CJN. "But when you were wounded — we couldn't leave them — some of the wounded committed suicide in order not to be captured."

Even 50 years later, Silverman shudders when he recalls the brutality of the Germans when they captured a Jewish partisan — the slow torture was indescribable.

From Victims to Victors was awarded the Toronto Jewish Book Committee's 1993 Andrzej and Karolina Jus Prize for Holocaust Literature. The three authors of the book are the founders and builders of the Yad Vashem Holocaust Memorial in Earl Bales Park, created by sculptor, Ernest Raab.

Silverman and Smuschkowitz, who are cousins, are members of the National Command of the Jewish War Veterans of Canada.

Celebrations in the Yukon

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

On VE-Day, Sam Pasternack remembers that "jubilation spontaneously broke out as the entire base at Watson Lake in the Yukon began a 48-hour celebration."

Pasternack, who joined the Royal Canadian Air Force when he was 17, says he had just landed at Watson Lake and was up in the control tower, when the news that the Germans had surrendered came over the Teletype machine.

Sam Pasternack

During his 37 months in the RCAF, he worked as a wireless electrical mechanic, serving at several bases across Canada including the No. 1 Wireless School in Montreal and the No. 6 Bombing and Gunnery School in Mountainview, Ont.

He was then posted to the North West Air Command Headquarters and the North West Staging Route which was an air route extending from Edmonton through White Horse in the Yukon and into Alaska.

War materials for the Soviet Union were flown up by this route; Russian ferry command pilots would pick up the supplies and fly them across the Bering Strait to Soviet bases in Siberia.

This route was also used to supply the Canadian and U.S. forces in their efforts to recapture the Aleutian Islands from the Japanese.

Pasternack looked after the wireless equipment and communications on the ground and at times, if a wireless expert was needed, he volunteered to join the aircraft going north to Alaska.

Pasternack is the national commander of the 1,400-member Jewish War Veterans of Canada, located in eight posts from coast to coast.

Screams of joy heard as camp liberated by U.S.

By HARRY KOZUCH

I was taken away from home at age 16. After being in several camps, I was transferred with many others in 1945 to Ebensee, a branch of Mathausen, located in the mountains of upper Austria. Ebensee was known as the death camp.

It was the month of May: the air in the mountains was fresh and pleasant, the desire to survive was stronger than ever. One morning an assembly was called. The chief SS officer and the camp commandant told us a battle was to take place around the camp and for our safety, we were going to be gathered inside the tunnels.

In the mountains we had built tunnels for a war munitions factory. The inside was partially finished and big enough to accommodate 20,000 people. There were a lot of explosives to blow the place up.

We had some idea about the plans, and all those assembled shouted "No," and we refused to obey the order. Most of the SS guards had run away. There was not enough manpower to force us. The crematorium had stopped working because of fuel shortages. The smell of the bodies laying around the crematorium was awful.

The next morning we noticed a white cloth flying from the chimney of the crematorium. Late that same day screams of joy were heard throughout the camp. The Americans are here. With all the strength of a 35-kg (77 lbs.) man, I ran with everyone else to the gate.

And there was an American soldier standing on his armored vehicle. Everyone tried to touch him, to see if he was real. Are we liberated? Are we free? The soldier's clothes were torn in shreds, he was in his underwear fearing for his life. This was not a dream, it was real.

I tried to find my brother David. I went to the so-called hospital — a few barracks separated by barb wire and a heavy gate. The gate was open.

I went from barrack to barrack calling "David, the Americans are here, we are free." Very few could move. There were live and dead bodies spread out on the floors and beds.

I found David, took him under the arm and we walked out. It was a miracle he was alive, and I will always remember the date, May 6.

The next day we assembled according to national groups. The Jews made up a small group. An American officer talked to us in Jewish, encouraged us that help was coming. We sang the Hatikvah. Most of us cried for joy.

'We had a helluva party'

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

For almost 22 years, Jack Cahan served in the Royal Canadian Air Force as a pilot — 17 years with the regular force and five years in the reserve.

On VE-Day, Cahan, who had been released from regular duty in February 1945 and was in the reserve, recalls that he was in civilian clothes working as a store manager at Richstone Bakeries in Montreal when he heard the news that the war in Europe was over.

Cahan donned his uniform and headed downtown to Peel and St. Catherine streets and joined the throngs of celebrants. He says that with five of his buddies, "we had a helluva party."

Cahan later rejoined the RCAF and served as a squadron leader until 1965. He served with the NATO forces in France for four years.

When he received his wings at the end of 1944, he says the attrition rates were falling and overseas personnel requirements were declining. "I have one major regret," says Cahan, "and it has bothered me all my life — I did not see action."

"Nevertheless," he says, "we were lucky, for it was very important to me as a Jewish Canadian to serve in the Canadian Forces. I am proud to have been a member of the Allied forces which brought the war to a halt."

Cahan is the commander of the Metropolitan Toronto Post of the Jewish War Veterans of Canada and a deputy commander of the National Command. He remains active in the RCAF Pilot's Club, the Aircrew Association of the British Commonwealth and other associations. He is an active community worker and is involved in raising money for school fund-raising projects.

on the boat (I was a wireless operator) and indeed, we heard the official announcement. But the flight-sergeant warned us that our job wasn't done. Japan was still fighting and being on the Pacific coast, we were closest to the Orient and liable to be shipped over there.

So we were happy but we were concerned ... and a little scared.

For us the war was not over. However, because I had a job to go back to (which was a rarity for many servicemen who had joined while the Great Depression was still on), I was given the option of taking a discharge if I went back to the same employer, as had been agreed by law. Without much hope of getting to Japan, I was soon back at work as a copy editor at the Winnipeg Free Press.

I was on the desk when the A-bomb was dropped and again when Japan surrendered a couple of days later.

'It was a relief that it was finally finished'

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Albert Glazer received several citations while with the Royal Air Force and the Royal Canadian Air Force. On VE-Day Glazer was in England.

"It was a relief that it was finally finished — that it was over and we no longer were under pressure," he says.

Glazer was trained as a ground radar expert and during his training, he took optional flying. Although he was a non-aircrew member, he flew with the Malta night fighters and radar equipped bombers and had 564 operational hours to his credit, flying in Wellingtons and Beaufighters.

He was stationed in England, Scotland and Malta (which was the hottest spot of the European war). Malta, Glazer says, was truly isolated. The nearest British bases were almost 1,000 miles away — Gibraltar to the west and Alexandria in the other direction. The Allied planes were able to inflict almost mortal damage to the enemy ships carrying supplies to Rommel and his Afrika Korps.

Malta endured more bombs than the city of London, England. Glazer says it was crucial that Malta remain under Allied control.

As a squadron leader in 1942, Glazer was ordered to go to Buckingham Palace where he was awarded a Distinguished Flying Cross by King George VI. He was the first non-flying airman to win this distinction.

Albert Glazer is seen with the daughter-in-law of Air Marshall Sir Ivor Broom, his former roommate, at a reunion last month in London, England.

In 1992, he received the Malta George Cross 50th Anniversary Medal for outstanding service in Malta. He has also received an Africa Star, Atlantic Star, Defence Medal and Canada 125th Anniversary Medal.

Last month, Glazer flew to London, England, as a guest of the television show, This is Your Life, to appear on a program honoring his former roommate, Air Marshal Sir Ivor Broom, who had a distinguished career in the Royal Air Force.

Although the guns have been silenced for 50 years, Glazer remains committed to the Jewish War Veterans of Canada and the Malta George Cross Island Association, an association of survivors of the terrible 1940 to 1943 blitz and siege.

'It was a moving experience'

Special to The CJN

Jack Grossman, a member of the Royal Canadian Air Force, who served overseas for four years in World War II, was on leave in London, England on VE-Day and celebrated the end of the war in Picadilly Square.

"It was a moving experience," says Grossman, "and I was very relieved that the war was finally over and very thankful to be alive. It was a period in my life that will remain with me all the days of my life."

Grossman, who was a bomb aimer and photographer, was stationed in Yorkshire, England in the 6th Group Bomber Command and in the Canadian 424 Squadron in Topcliffe, Yorkshire. His squadron flew Lancaster Bombers, with their bombing raids aimed at targets in France and Germany.

Grossman spent one year at a coastal command base in Castle Archdale in Ireland, where he flew Sunderland Flying Boats over the Atlantic, searching out German submarines.

Today, Grossman, president of Billy Bee Honey Products Ltd. of Toronto, believes that his training in the RCAF Bomber Command did not teach him about marketing "but I did learn how to aim at an objective and this has undoubtedly helped me in my business, which has sales around the world."

Rabin, Weizman address Yom Hashoah ceremony

Allied victory overshadowed by Holocaust: PM

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Fifty years after the victory over Nazi Germany and the liberation of the death camps, Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin last week thanked the Allied forces in the name of the Jewish people.

Speaking at last Wednesday night's state ceremony ushering in Yom Hashoah at Yad Vashem, Rabin said, however, that the Allied victory would always be overshadowed by the Holocaust.

The ceremony was opened by President Ezer Weizman, who also referred to the significance of the 50th anniversary of the liberation.

When VE-Day is marked this week in Europe, he said, "with the attendance of the Israeli president as the symbol of Israel's sovereignty ... the Jewish people will say proudly — loud and clear: 'I shall not die but shall live,' " Weizman declared.

But in the plaza beside the Warsaw Ghetto memorial, an awe-filled silence enveloped the overflow crowd of survivors and their families, as well as diplomats, dignitaries, Israelis and tourists from all walks of life, as the national flag was lowered to half-mast.

Standing next to the flame that was lit by Yad Vashem advisory board head Yosef Burg, Rabin's voice rang out in the dark: "In the name of the Jewish people, the best of whose sons and daughters went to their deaths facing the 'walls of death' and in the gas chambers; on behalf of the ghetto fighters, who pulled the trigger until they could no longer; on behalf of the survivors of the Holocaust, and on behalf of their sons and daughters, I wish today to give thanks to the Allied nations and their armies which — even having tarried too long — brought about the day of redemption.

Israel came to a two-minute standstill to mourn and remember the six million. [RNS photo]

"Fifty years have passed since one-third of our people were incinerated in the crematoria, since the day that the Allies trampled the human beasts — the remnants of the army of Nazi Germany," he said. "Fifty years have passed since we opened the doors of Hell and exposed the great tragedy of the Jewish people.

"Today, together with the entire free world, we mark VE-Day — and we are not joyful. We take special note of the war waged by the Allied armies, in whose ranks 1.5 million Jews served. We offer thanks to the representatives of the small Jewish community in Eretz Israel who served in the British army. But we have not joined, and will not join, in the celebrating. The Holocaust which befell the Jewish people was greater than we could bear."

Survivors' tales to be collected

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — The Yad Vashem Holocaust Memorial in Jerusalem and Israel's Education Ministry have launched a nationwide campaign to collect testimony from aging survivors.

Education Minister Amnon Rubinstein and Yad Vashem director Avner Shalev described the project at a news conference in Jerusalem last week.

The joint project, to begin next month, will recruit Israeli high school students to gather survivors' testimony.

Rubinstein said the project would help document all available information from what he called a "fast-disappearing generation" of Holocaust survivors.

He also hoped that recruiting Israeli teenagers to gather the information would deepen their motivation to learn about he Holocaust.

The students, after receiving guidance on how to gather testimony, will begin knocking on doors in the pilot communities of Carmiel, Kiryat Gat and Ra'anana.

"We are asking our students to visit survivors' homes, write down the names of the people who were murdered and assassinated by the Nazis in death camps, record the testimonials and collect mementos and other evidence of those tragic days," said Rubinstein.

Like Rubinstein, Shalev stressed the urgency to obtain living testimony.

"There is a transition between generations. The generation of survivors who are living witnesses to the tragedy are fading out, are leaving us, and the responsibility to keep their remembrance is taken by younger generations," Shalev said.

Meanwhile, Israel Defence Force soldiers have entered some 50,000 names into Yad Vashem's computerized database from handwritten "pages of testimony" in different languages, Shalev said. Another 30,000 names are expected to be added this year.

As part of the large-scale effort to gather documentation, Shalev also announced that Yad Vashem and film director Steven Spielberg will cooperate in a drive to gather video interviews with survivors.

In the wake of Schindler's List, Spielberg established the Survivors of the Shoah Visual History Foundation to gather filmed testimonies of survivors from around the world, including Israel.

Law of Return sparks heated debate in Israel

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

TEL AVIV — Re-igniting a heated controversy that has long raged in Israel and in Diaspora communities throughout the world, two Orthodox members of the Knesset have proposed amendments to the Law of Return.

The proposed amendments to the law, which was passed in July 1950 granting all Jews the right to immigrate to Israel, was also the subject of a heated exchange last week among members of the Jewish Agency for Israel's executive.

The latest proposals were made amid an ongoing debate about the large number of immigrants from the former Soviet Union who are not Jewish according to Halachah.

According to a recently released Interior Ministry report, more than 110,000 non-Jews have come to Israel since 1989, representing some 20 per cent of all olim from the former Soviet Union in that period.

The Absorption Ministry estimates that the number will continue to increase in the coming years.

The amendments were introduced this week by Yitzhak Levy of the National Religious Party and Avraham Ravitz of the Degel HaTorah Party.

The first amendment seeks to abolish the "grandparent clause," which in 1970 was added to the Law of Return to allow the non-Jewish grandchildren of Jewish grandparents to immigrate to Israel.

The second amendment would bar those who convert to Judaism in Israel from bringing the rest of their non-Jewish family to the country.

Absorption Minister Yair Tsaban, who is strongly opposed to abolishing the grandparent clause amendment, pointed out in a recent newspaper interview that no more than two per cent of all olim would be affected by such amendments.

"These are negligible numbers, and anyone who thinks that the amendment will solve the problem of non-Jewish olim from the former Soviet Union is deluding himself," Tsaban was quoted as saying in the Israeli daily Ha'aretz.

He added that although converts should not have an automatic right to bring over the rest of their families, he would prefer that the issue be dealt with by the Supreme Court, rather than by an amendment to the Law of Return.

Last Monday, the Jewish Agency's executive began a series of discussions on this issue.

Acting agency chair Avraham Burg reiterated his opposition to any changes to the law.

"Any alteration would have a profound effect on Israel's society and its relationship with Diaspora Jewry," he said. "Those who want to touch the Law of Return are themselves shooting immigration in the head."

Earlier attempts to change the law have provoked outrage among Diaspora Jews, especially attempts to deny recognition of conversions performed by non-Orthodox rabbis abroad.

Yehiel Leket, chair of the agency's youth aliyah department, echoed Burg's position. He said the Zionist movement remains opposed to any changes in the law.

Given the low number of people who would be affected by the proposed changes, he said, the issue does not constitute a national problem.

In contrast, Uri Gordon, chair of the agency's immigration department, strongly opposed that view, saying he is "against bringing gentiles to Israel."

The controversy over non-Jews in Israel has also spilled over to the related issues of circumcision and the recognition of conversions in Israel not performed by the Orthodox establishment.

Tsaban disclosed in the Ha'aretz interview that the Ministry of Absorption has contributed $10,000 to Keren Habrit, which provides subsidized circumcisions to adult immigrants who are refused the services of the Religious Affairs Ministry.

The fund was established last year by the Reform and Conservative movements in Israel, in response to the plight of olim who ran into difficulties with the Orthodox establishment and who could not afford the high costs of adult circumcision.

According to Amir Shacham, director of the Reform movement's Israel Religious Action Centre, the demand for the fund's services reaches into the thousands.

Andrew Sacks, a Conservative rabbi and mohel who heads Keren Habrit, said in an interview that non-Jewish children from abroad who were adopted by Israeli parents were also refused circumcisions by the Orthodox establishments, on the grounds that their parents were not maintaining an observant lifestyle.

He also said the tendency of the Orthodox establishment to convert as few olim as possible creates great hardships for them.

The only Reform and Conservative conversions now recognized by the Interior Ministry are those performed abroad.

But the Supreme Court is expected to rule soon on a petition filed by the Israel Religious Action Centre and the Association for Civil Rights in Israel, demanding that non-Orthodox conversions in Israel be recognized as well.

Editors arrested

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Israeli authorities have taken into custody the editors of the country's two leading newspapers, in connection with a year-old case alleging the papers engaged in wiretapping in an effort to boost circulation.

Allegations surfaced last year that senior executives from Ma'ariv and Yediot Achronot had been involved in the illegal wiretapping of the offices of each other and other journalists, as well as those of public and political figures.

Police originally investigated two private detectives who have since been indicted for wiretapping the phone, fax and cellular phone lines of hundreds of people, including President Ezer Weizman and officials with Shin Bet, Israel's domestic intelligence service.

Police also confiscated documents from Nimrodi's home and office. Five other Ma'ariv employees, including the paper's security officer, were called in for questioning.

Nimrodi, who has been questioned by police before, faced allegations of illegally hiring the two private investigators to carry out illegal wiretaps and of obstructing justice.

Scud deaths tallied

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — A new study suggests stress played a major role in the deaths of Israelis during the 1991 Persian Gulf War, when Israel was attacked by Scud missiles launched by Iraq.

The report, published last week in the Journal of the American Medical Association, found that Israel's overall death rate soared when the Scuds fell.

The team of three researchers from Hadassah Medical School involved in the study found that the actual death toll on Jan. 18, 1991 — the day of the first Iraqi attack — was 147. That represents an incidence of death 58 per cent higher than the same day the previous year, even though no one was directly hit by a missile.

The researchers stressed they had no definitive answers regarding the causes of death, but added it was likely tensions connected to the war could have been a factor.

"There are a number of possibilities," one of the researchers, Dr. Leon Epstein, told Israel Radio. "This was a very stressful period. People were worried about an unknown possibility.

"It is known that stress can provoke heart attacks," he added. "Also, there could have been breathing problems connected to using the [gas] masks in sealed rooms."

Altogether, Iraq fired 39 missiles at Israel on 17 separate days between Jan. 18 and Feb. 25, 1991. The attacks caused extensive property damage and more than 1,000 injuries, but only two deaths as a result of direct hits, the study said.

Link alleged to killing squad

"We owe this to all Canadians, as well as the Holocaust survivors in our midst," Harris said.

Pointing to the activities of the Einsatzgruppen, Harris said "these units cut a murderous swath through western Poland and the former Soviet Union. We continue to question why the government is not proceeding with a criminal charge instead of deportation to another country."

B'nai Brith spokesperson Marvin Kurz pointed to the "momentum" building on the war crimes dossier. "However, [the Oberlander] case ... is only the tip of the iceberg. Not only must these cases proceed expeditiously, the government must pick up the pace and bring forward the other nine cases it is aware of simultaneously and without further delay."

In recent months, the Justice Department's war crimes unit announced it was forwarding 12 completed files to Immigration for denaturalization and deportation. Federal authorities said they would test the legal waters with four cases.

Jewish groups have objected to that strategy, saying the successful deportation of Jacob Luitjens to Holland has provided sufficient precedent. They urged all 12 cases be commenced.

"We are in a desperate race against time," said Sol Littman, Canadian head of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre. He applauded Justice Minister Allan Rock and Citizenship and Immigration Minister Sergio Marchi for "keeping their promise to name these men" and he urged a quick hearing.

So far Erichs Tobiass, 84, of Toronto, and Joseph Nemsila, 82, of Oshawa have been named as alleged war criminals.

Tobiass has been accused of participating in the mass execution of Jews in Nazi-occupied Latvia while Nemsila is accused of being a member of the Hlinka Guard, the Slovak equivalent of the German SS.

Nemsila was not the first alleged Hlinka Guard named by federal authorities. In 1990, Stephen Reistetter of St. Catharines, Ont., was charged with kidnapping 3,000 Jews and deporting them to Nazi camps. Charges were dropped when witnesses died.

Business Profile

Robert Fragman: CEO of Adventure Electronics

Chain's success driven by survival instincts

By RACHEL ALKALLAY
Special to The CJN

MONTREAL — It seems they're popping up everywhere. Especially due to its recent acquisition of Majestic Sound, Adventure Electronics stores are exploding onto the Ontario scene.

Robert Fragman is the president and chief executive officer of Adventure Electronics. Based in Montreal, it is Quebec's largest chain of home electronics retail shops and rapidly making its presence in Toronto.

"I'm a survivor," says Fragman. "When I was 8 years old, I would dig around in the fields for potatoes to sell to the Americans. That kind of experience marks you for life."

"When I was 8 years old, I would dig around in the fields for potatoes to sell to the Americans. That kind of experience marks you for life."

Born in Grenoble, France, Fragman and his family survived the war by hiding from the occupying Nazi forces. "I had to develop an adult's understanding of the world to survive. To the outside world, I had to pretend my parents were strangers, calling them 'Monsieur' and 'Madame.' At home, we tried to have a normal family life, with regular meals, conversations and parties."

At 16, Fragman immigrated to Canada with his family. It was the start of France's war in Indo-China and his parents didn't want him to be drafted. "They also wanted to come to a country without political problems," he laughs ruefully.

Fragman began working immediately — he had left school at 14 at the suggestion of the high school principal, who bluntly informed him and his parents that he was wasting his time in school. He studied electronics at night while working in the daytime.

"I looked around and realized the future was in electronics, which to me also seemed a glamorous business," he said.

He sold radios at SOS (a retail store) and learned how to repair them at the same time. "I wasn't very good at the repair business, but I was good with people."

Fragman met his French-born wife Irma at this time; kindred spirits, they realized they shared the "dream of being self-sufficient and of helping our parents when they got older." Sharing the same goals and determination to succeed has guided them through 40 years as successful business and marriage partners.

The early years were marked by long hours and self-sacrifice. Because of their determination to be financially secure, they would forgo vacations, fancy homes and other luxuries.

Their goal was security, not wealth, and for 12 years after Fragman opened his first television rental shop on Park Avenue, the Atlantic Service Centre, it was a struggle to achieve that security.

Robert Fragman is president and chief executive officer of Adventure Electronics.

Irma worked as a secretary to keep money coming in. "Thank heavens," Fragman said, "as we would have starved in the beginning if she hadn't." She began running the administrative end of the shop a couple of years later, while keeping her secretarial job and maintaining their growing household. Today, Fragman still praises her and gives her full credit for her efforts.

In 1969, television rental was declining because people were buying their own sets. Fragman decided to go retail and opened two boutiques — one in Chomedey, the other in Jacques Cartier. He had identified the consumer mood perfectly. From 1969 to 1983, Atlantique Image et Son mushroomed into a giant retail chain, with 184 stores in Quebec and Ontario and $89 million in sales.

In 1980, in an effort to consolidate, Fragman went into partnership with a Torontonian, Bernard Klein, with each having a 50 per cent stake in the company. Klein bought out the Fragmans in 1984 (they retained 20 per cent of the stock), and the couple retired — for exactly a year.

Their return to the business was problematic. Prevented by a non-competition clause from being a rival of Atlantique, Fragman launched Marche de l'Electronique in partnership with the electronics giant. The partnership did not sit well with anyone: Fragman disapproved of the sales-driven (as compared to consumer-driven) direction taken by Atlantique's new management. Bitter public battles ensued and Fragman was forced off the board of Atlantique in January 1988.

He bounced back with Adventure Electronics, opening his first superstore in September 1989 just ahead of the recession. Business has boomed. More commonly known by its French name of Aventure Electronique, the chain is one of the largest retailers of electronic equipment in Canada, and the largest in Quebec. Sales reached $139.1 million in 1993, up 11 per cent from $125.3 million in 1992. With the continuing aggressive expansion of the business, sales are expected to increase.

The business currently employs close to 1,000 people in Quebec and Ontario in over 130 stores.

Fragman has again tapped into the consumer psyche with his superstore/boutique concept, which caters to a broad-based clientele. The stores stock televisions, VCRs and a full range of audio/visual and electronic gadgets, precisely the items which Statistics Canada says consumers are loading up on during these days of cocooning.

Gadgetry is in; for example, in higher income groups, more than 53 per cent own CD players and 93 per cent own VCRs; for low-income earners, the figures are 16 per cent and 52 per cent respectively.

The 30,000-square-foot superstores provide all the equipment needed for the comfort of a Canadian home, plus trained personnel and child-care centres where consumers can leave their children while they shop. Expansion in Quebec and Ontario continues, with the 1994 acquisition of Majestic Sound, which added nine superstores and 17 shopping mall boutiques to the chain.

Fragman plans "to saturate the market. Landlords call me up offering store locations, because Adventure Electronics attracts business."

The retail home electronics business is fiercely competitive. Fragman's former company, Atlantique Image et Son, fell prey to bad management and the recession in 1990, a year after Adventure Electronics opened its first shop. The loss was difficult for Fragman, both financially (he and his wife owned 20 per cent of the stock) and emotionally (Atlantique had been his carefully nurtured creation for over 30 years).

But Fragman remained optimistic. "You always have to look at the positives and realize that life moves on. Even in the darkest days of the Nazis in France, life continued. And I know that I would do whatever is necessary in order to survive and provide for my family."

Adventure Electronics went public in November 1993, with the Fragmans controlling 65 per cent of the shares. The Fragmans continue to put in long hours daily at their Ville d'Anjou headquarters. Robert's spacious office is equipped with a computer which provides sales updates every five minutes. He does take vacations these days, but he is never far from the business, receiving daily faxes from company headquarters wherever he is travelling.

The Fragmans' son, two daughters and sons-in-law, are involved in the business; the children began in the business in their early teens and are involved in sales and day-to-day company operations.

An important component of the chain's success are its longtime employees, many of whom have been with Fragman since his days at Atlantique. He attributes the excellent company morale to his open-door policy: employees can come to the office with their problems.

Thankfully for the Fragmans' original dream, their parents lived to enjoy the children's hard-earned success; Fragman's mother, a sprightly woman in her late 80s, continues to enjoy her family's achievements.

At 60, Fragman is as involved in the business as ever, with no plans to retire again.

He hopes his children will eventually take over the business; their involvement is a strong sign of their interest, but Fragman leaves the choice to them. He marvels at his grandchildren's ability to program VCRs and operate computers. The owner of the retail home electronics giant laughs that he himself "can't operate a VCR."

Gov't to bail out kibbutzim

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — The Israeli government has approved a recovery plan for the nation's kibbutzim, agreeing to wipe out some $2 billion in debt.

Under the plan, the government will take control of some kibbutz-owned land and pay about $800 million of the debt to banks.

Under another provision of the plan, the government and banks will forgive about $1.2 billion owed by the kibbutzim.

Finance Minister Avraham Shohat said a contractual agreement still had to be signed.

Saying he hoped the plan would solve the problems of most kibbutzim, Shohat added that if within two or three years the problems were not solved, some kibbutzim would have to be dismantled.

Avraham Shohat

Critics assailed the bailout plan as an attempt to buy votes for the Labor Party in next year's national elections.

Likud Member of Knesset Michael Eitan said the government had rushed ahead with the agreement before thoroughly checking the kibbutz movement's assets.

"The kibbutzim have assets which are worth more than their debts," he said, adding that he suspects there are kibbutz-owned companies abroad which are guilty of breaking Israel's tax laws.

The Kibbutz Artzi movement, which represents 85 of the country's 270 collective settlements, denied the claims.

"We don't have any money, not here and not abroad," said the movement's secretary general, Amiram Afrati.

Israel warns Morocco

JERUSALEM — Israel's Industry and Trade minister, Micha Harish, warned Morocco last week that its refusal to allow Israeli industrialists to participate on behalf of the Israel Export Institute at the SIPEC packaging exhibition in Casablanca is liable to harm the country's economic standing.

Harish said Morocco's actions countered the principles of free world trade as encapsulated in GATT, warning that political boycotts of this type will bring sharp reactions from the United States and Europe.

Jordan-Israel rail-link

JERUSALEM — A rail connection between Haifa port and the Dead Sea industries of both Jordan and Israel was to be presented this week at an Amman conference on Jordan Valley development.

Other projects planned are a railway and highway from Haifa to Irbid, via the Jordan River border crossing, and a highway between Ashdod and Amman, crossing at the Allenby Bridge.

Free Trade talks continue

JERUSALEM — Israel and Jordan were to conclude trade negotiations by this week's deadline, Industry and Trade Ministry Foreign Trade Administration director Zohar Peri said last week.

The agreement was being held up by Israeli demands for greater tariff cuts and by the lack of an agreement in principle on the Jordanian side on the framework of a free-trade agreement that will come into force within three years

Original Starsband

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — A recent corporate party at the Inn on the Park was a model of elegance, with decorations in white satin and silver, and ice sculptures adorning the 60-foot buffet table.

And the band chosen for this lavish affair was the Original Starsband with Juno-award winning singer Liberty Silver.

Vince Meleca and Victor Miolla started the Original Starsband in 1972. Band leader and manager, Roy Meleca (Vince's brother), a percussionist with the band for 21 years, told The CJN the band has always played a mix of top 40 hits and ethnic music.

The band mainly played for Italian audiences until 1975, when a Jewish guitar player joined, introducing Jewish music into the repertoire and introducing the band to the Jewish simchah circuit.

"We became 90 per cent a Jewish band. We do more weddings ... elegant affairs," Meleca said.

Originally the band worked weekends, because most of its members had other jobs and businesses, Meleca explained. "The band was a serious hobby that we just loved."

But five years ago they decided to increase their playing time, shortly after Shlomo Aviv — he specializes in Yiddish, Hebrew, French and Latin music — joined the band as a singer. They also added another guitarist and saxophone player.

The band went from 20 engagements a year in 1990 to 80 in 1992, Meleca said. "We're keeping a steady 80 a year. That's plenty [of business] for everybody."

The Original Starsband is now a seven-piece band with three singers — Aviv, Silver and Peter May, but all the musicians do some singing.

"That's the beauty of the band," Meleca said. "Five or six of us give background vocals. You don't have to hire other musicians."

Silver is the band's feature vocalist while May, an award winning vocalist, is the crooner who sings the romantic classics, Latin music and disco, Meleca said. "I couldn't ask for anything more because each vocalist is a specialist at what they do."

The band has been much in demand even during the recession, and one of the reasons is that their price has always been fair, he said.

"I've got Liberty Silver and I'm still just charging $850 to $900 an hour. As far as I'm concerned Liberty Silver is the best singer in the country."

Silver has been singing with the band for the last two years. It started with one engagement — someone offered to hire the band for a wedding if Meleca could get Silver to sing too. "The chemistry between her and the band was right," he said. "We liked her and she likes us."

Silver told The CJN she enjoyed singing at simchahs. "It's a family atmosphere. It's a celebration and it's nice to be part of the celebration."

She also said she feels very much appreciated as an entertainer, especially when couples ask her to sing Somewhere Inside Your Love — for which she won a Juno in 1980 — as the wedding song. "It's nice to know that my music can reach their soft spot," Silver said. "What I feel other people relate to."

Complaints of a Dutiful Daughter:

Academy Award nominee studies Alzheimer's

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

An Academy Award nominee for best documentary feature, Complaints of a Dutiful Daughter is a powerfully empathetic film about the ravages of Alzheimer's disease.

The subject is Doris Hoffmann, the mother of the film's director, Deborah Hoffmann, whose tragedy is compounded by the fact that, in the past, she was a woman of intellectual achievement.

The documentary, part of the Toronto Jewish Film Festival, is scheduled to be screened on May 11 at approximately 8:45 p.m.

The film begins with a jolt as Doris asks Deborah plaintively, "I was your mother?"

Doris meanders on in this confused vein, finally asking, "Did we go to elementary school together?"

Doris' mental decline began at the age of 70, when she forgot that her husband — a world-renowned scientist — had died.

Though she could function amazingly well on some levels, Doris was otherwise incompetent — appearing for the same dentist appointment every day, forgetting she had been married, repeatedly cailing Deborah about a hearing-aid, trying in good faith to see a show with an old ticket, and consuming numerous bananas at one sitting.

The Toronto Jewish Film Festival

When Deborah finally realized that her beloved mother was stricken by Alzheimer's, she was devastated. And she was shaken when Doris, without knowing what she was doing, turned hostile.

The film does not focus on Doris' out-of-character antipathy toward Deborah, who's the picture of patience and understanding.

Rather, it documents Doris' gentler slide into abject senility: her inability to remember much of her life; her poignant realization that something is terribly amiss; her seemingly impulsive decision to pack all her belongings, including a bunch of bananas, into suitcases.

Eventually, Deborah commits Doris to a nursing home. To Deborah's delight, Doris adapts remarkably well and thrives in her new environment.

As Deborah observes, you can still be "someone" without a memory.

This uplifting message frames Complaints of a Dutiful Daughter, a riveting film that all can appreciate.

Doris Hoffmann and her daughter, the film-maker.

Film documents 60-year friendship

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

They met almost 60 years ago and have never stopped being the best of friends.

Their durable relationship is the subject of Ronit Bezalel's affecting documentary, When Shirley Met Florence, which will be screened at the Toronto Jewish Film Festival on May 11 at 8:15 p.m.

The film celebrates their common interests, but also draws attention to a salient fact: Shirley and Florence, Montreal Jews of East European stock, are radically different with respect to sexual orientation.

Shirley, a grandmother, is heterosexual, while Florence is a lesbian. Despite this divergence, the affection they have for each other has hardly dimmed, even after nearly six decades.

The pair met near the corner of Villenueve and L'Esplanade. Shirley was playing her mandolin, when Florence suddenly appeared and began singing the lyrics to Shirley's music. Since then, music has been one of the factors that has cemented their touching friendship.

Bezalel's documentary, a National Film Board of Canada production, is essentially a paean to rare and beautiful friendships such as theirs.

As the movie unfolds, they reminisce about their adolescence, while Florence explains her lesbianism and liaisons and her reaction to Shirley's marriage to her brother, Moe.

The camera follows them around Montreal as they revisit an old school, emerge from a well-known bakery with bagels, and peer over a fence at a tenement where either Shirley or Florence once lived.

As the film ends, Shirley plays her mandolin, while Florence strums on her guitar. The smiles on their faces are beatific. They are still in love.

What a friendship. What a film.

Miami Beach, the holiday mecca of North American Jews, was once like a shtetl, a home-away-from home for tourists who revelled in the Yiddish language.

Today Miami Beach is being renovated and gentrified, and the new developments are driving out the old Jewish denizens.

The ones who steadfastly remain, those whose favorite restaurant is Rascal House on Collins Avenue, are the subject of Bonnie Cohen's nostalgic documentary, Meet Me In Miami Beach, which will be screened at the Toronto Jewish Film Festival on May 11 at 6:30 p.m.

Opening with a magnificent shot of the Atlantic Ocean framed by a crimson-yellow sunset, Meet Me In Miami Beach is an ode to the "chosen few" who could afford the luxury of luxuriating in the sun before the age of mass travel.

Old-timers, such as Moshe Davis and Bluma Lifshitz, recall how privileged they felt to escape the winter weather and enjoy Florida's simple outdoor pleasures.

To these vacationers, Florida is doubtless beneficial to their health. As the camera pans on a group of elderly people exercising, their trainer exclaims, "Instead of kvetching, we are stretching," which just about sums it up.

Cafe Au Lait

Cafe Au Lait, May 10 at 9:15 p.m., is a French comedy with racial overtones, set in Paris.

The protagonists Felix (Mathieu Kassovitz), an irritable Jewish bicycle courier; Jamal (Hubert Kounde), an elegant black Muslim student; and Lola (Julie Mauduech), a free-spirited West Indian mulatto who loves them both and is pregnant.

Cafe Au Lait, which is directed by Kassovitz, never resolves the paternity of the child. Is the father Felix or Jamal? But that conundrum hardly matters. What drives this light-hearted film is the evolving, occasionally amusing relationship between the lovers.

In its pacing, Cafe Au Lait tends to be rather slow but is worth the price of admission.—S.K.

At the Koffler Gallery: The Caro Connection, a retrospective view of the world-renowned sculptor Sir Anthony Caro, is on view at the Koffler Gallery April 30 to June 9.

Highlights of Caro's remarkable career of more than 50 years include winning the sculpture prize at the Paris Biennale in 1959; being appointed a Commander of the Order of the British Empire in 1969; and being knighted by Queen Elizabeth in 1987. According to American critic Hilton Kramer, "He is unquestionably the most important sculptor to have come out of England since Henry Moore."

Also on view at the Koffler Gallery until June 9 is a photographic narrative of The March of the Living, 1994, by the distinguished photographer Nir Bareket. Opening reception for both exhibits is May 3 at 8 p.m.

One-Woman Show: Actress Bryna Weiss presents her critically acclaimed one-woman show Lily in Artpark-at-the Church, May 5 to 7 and May 12 to 14 in matinee and evening performances. Tickets are $16.50.

Direct from sold-out performances in London and Israel, Lily is a sensitively told story of one woman's bittersweet odyssey from Germany and the Holocaust to Israel and the Persian Gulf War. Lily was written at the suggestion of Weiss by Hindi Brooks, a writer with numerous television credits. Artpark-in-the-Church is located at the corner of Plain and South Fourth streets in Lewiston, N.Y. For phone orders, call 1-800-659-PARK (7275).

Toronto Rabbi Turns Performer: Eye On Arts recently received the following correspondence from Rose Milley, assistant to the manager of the Toronto Mendelssohn Choir: "The 101st Toronto Mendelssohn Choir season opens on Sunday afternoon, Oct. 1, with a wonderfully intriguing program, the world premiere of Derek Holman's Songs of Sion, Bernstein's Chichester Psalms, and Honegger's King David. This performance also has a stellar cast with Heidi Klassen soprano, Jean Stilwell alto, Mark Dubois tenor, and a gentleman whom you may know, Dr. Gunther Plaut as narrator." Roy Thomson Hall, 416-598-0422.

In Brief: David Newman, who teaches an intermediate level adult Yiddish class in conjunction with the Committee for Yiddish, is an accomplished singer and actor who began in Yiddish theatre in Poland before the war; he recently played the father's role in a recent Yiddish version of Come Blow Your Horn. Registration for his next course starts May 3 at 7 p.m. at Adath Israel Synagogue. For information, call Sharon Barron, 416-223-9042.

This season's closing concert by the Amadeus Ensemble takes place in the Glenn Gould Studio at the Canadian Broadcasting Centre, 250 Front St. W., Toronto, on May 7 at 8 p.m. The ensemble's leader and violinist Moshe Hammer welcomes special guests pianist Marc-Andre Hamelin and cellist Alexander Baillies, for an evening of music by Ravel.

The Rosedale United Church Choir and soloists present Leonard Bernstein Tonight, featuring excerpts from various Bernstein musicals, at the Rosedale United Church, Toronto, May 6 at 8 p.m. General admission $20. 416-924-0725.

Jill Segal is having a show and sale of recent watercolor, acrylic and mixed media paintings in her studio, 18 Prince Edward Blvd., Thornhill, Ont., May 12, 1 to 5 p.m., and May 13 and 14, 10 a.m. to 6 p.m.

A celebration of the 50th anniversary of VE-Day occurs at Nathan Phillips Square, Toronto, May 8, noon to 2 p.m.

Fiddler On The Roof, presented by 42 cast members and additional crew members of the Hilltop Musical Theatre Company, is scheduled for performance at St. Andrew's College, Aurora, May 24 to May 27 at 8 p.m., and May 28 at 3 p.m. Adults $15. 905-884-6625.

Koffman Kaddish Premiere

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — On May 6, the Beth Tzedec Synagogue will premiere a new version of the Reader's Kaddish, composed by world acclaimed jazz and classical musician, Moe Koffman.

It is dedicated to the memory of Koffman's parents, Max and Minnie Koffman, who died a month apart in March and April of 1994. The music has been arranged for cantor and choir by Gordon Kushner, Beth Tzedec's musical director, and will be chanted by Cantor Paul Kowarsky.

Koffman told The CJN he and his wife Gisele, along with family members Molly and John Pollock, Bernie and Rochelle Koffman and Pearl and Jerry Bloom, will mark the occasion at a reception for their guests following the service.

Koffman, 66, says the Kaddish is written in a traditional style of Yiddish melody. "I thought my dad would like this type of music — and this is what came out." He says he hopes others will use his music as a part of a service.

This is the first religious work written by Koffman, who began his musical career in New York 40 years ago. He plays the saxophone (alto and soprano), the clarinet and the flute, and has performed with many of the greats including, Jimmy Dorsey, Benny Goodman and Woody Herman.

He was appointed an Officer of the Order of Canada in 1994.

Koffman says one of the highlights of his career was composing Swinging Shepherd Blues in 1958. It became an international success and today, there are more than 350 recorded versions of the piece.

He describes his parents as "a well loved, wonderful couple," noting that when his father died, "my mother couldn't go on without him. The new Reader's Kaddish is a tribute to their memory and their love."

Plenary to shape CJC future

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The 1,000 delegates expected to attend Canadian Jewish Congress' triennial Plenary Assembly will shape the future of the 76-year-old institution through their choice of president.

The two presidential candidates, both from Montreal, have vastly different styles and backgrounds. Thomas Hecht, 65, who came to Canada from war-torn Europe in 1942, is a strong Zionist and fundraiser with a reputation for putting his personal stamp on the causes he takes up.

Goldie Hershon, in her early 50s, supports modernity and moderation and is in the model of the hard-working, dues-paying party member. Unlike Hecht, who is known for his florid oratory, Hershon is reserved and has made it clear she is happiest working within a team and building upon the groundwork laid by outgoing president Irving Abella.

The new president will be taking office during a time of introspection. Congress, which bills itself as "the Parliament of Canadian Jewry," is now asking itself whether it should be a defender of rights in principle, or focus more narrowly on issues of specific Jewish concern. The threat of an ever-shrinking budget has brought this search for identity to a critical point.

Both candidates are running their campaigns as if seeking public office, buying advertising and using professional public relations services. Congress bylaws do not stipulate a spending cap.

Hershon, however, has steadfastly refused Hecht's challenge to an open debate, saying there is no precedent for such an event. Her platform emphasizes such issues as national unity, support for small communities and strengthening relations with Jews in other countries, including, of course, Israel.

"We must be certain the voice of the Jewish community in favor of federalism is communicated," she said in a statement.

Another week, another suspect

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A St. Catharines man accused of participating in the execution of civilians during World War II is the fourth alleged war criminal facing deportation from Canada.

Government documents filed in Federal Court last week allege that Johann Dueck failed to divulge to Canadian immigration and citizenship officials his membership in the Selidovka district police in German-occupied Ukraine from 1941 to 1943.

The document accuses Dueck of "participation in the executions of civilians and prisoners of war durirg that time."

Jewish groups applauded federal authorities for continuing to name alleged war criminals, but tempered their support with calls for action against eight others whose files have been transferred by the Justice

Hosts for IMO Teams

TORONTO — The Jewish and other ethnic communities in Toronto are being asked to help host more than 450 high school students from 80 countries this summer.

The students will be here to compete in the 36th International Mathematical Olympiad (IMO), July 13 to 25, at York University.

Organizers are asking communities to host a team with whose members they share a common heritage for dinner the evening of July 22. Most teams consist of six students and two team leaders.

The IMO is also looking for team guides of university age who can speak a second language.

For details, call 416-395-3568.

Laskin Honored

THUNDER BAY — Saul Laskin, who spearheaded the amalgamation of Ontario twin cities Port Arthur and Fort William into Thunder Bay, is being honored by his home town.

The youngest brother of the late Bora Laskin, a former chief justice of Canada, Laskin will be awarded an honorary doctorate of laws on May 27 by Lakehead University, where he was once chairman of the board.

Laskin, 76, was mayor of Port Arthur from 1962-70 and the first mayor of Thunder Bay, which this year is marking its 25th anniversary.

He is a former chair of Canadian Council of Christians and Jews and a former president of Toronto's Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue.

Na'amat Dinner

WINNIPEG — Na'amat's 46th annual Child Rescue Dinner was held here recently, with many of the guests, led by Israeli singing star Ahuva, dancing the horah around tables.

The evening also heard from Ze'ev Kedem, the Jewish National Fund's executive director for Manitoba and Saskatchewan.

Proceeds from the dinner will help support day care centres, vocational training and agricultural schools, full-care residential homes and social services for women and children in Israel.

ISRAEL

"Buzz" Beurling Honored

HAIFA — A graveside memorial service was held here recently for Canadian World War II flying ace Lt. George "Buzz" Beurling, who died in Israel's War of Independence.

Beurling, who volunteered for Israel during the 1948 war, is buried in Haifa's military cemetery. The non-Jewish hero was a decorated Spitfire pilot who was awarded Canada's Distinguished Service Order and Distinguished Flying Medal during World War II.

Population by 2020

JERUSALEM — A recent plan drawn up by the government predicts that in the year 2020, Israel's population will be 8.4 million, compared to 5.5 million today.

All cities' populations will rise, says the report, with the greater Tel Aviv region's number of inhabitants expected to increase from 2 million today to 3 million by 2020.

"Major efforts" will be made to increase settlement in the Negev and Galilee, the study said.

Palestinians Reunited

JERUSALEM — Some 100 Palestinian families, separated after the 1967 Six-Day War, will reunite after being granted permission by Israel.

The move was described as a goodwill gesture and Israel has suggested that an annual quota of 2,000 family reunifications be set.

Troops Kill Four

JERUSALEM — Israeli troops killed four Hezbollah gunmen and wounded several others last Wednesday in the southern Lebanon security zone.

No casualties were reported on the Israeli side.

Talks With S. Korea

JERUSALEM — A senior delegation from South Korea secretly visited Israel last month for talks about threats both countries face from North Korea.

The meeting came in the wake of recent reports that North Korea has sold Iran several missiles which are capable of reaching Israel.

Histadrut Probe

JERUSALEM — Police last week questioned Israel's deputy industry and trade minister for eight hours on her alleged involvement in the misuse of Histadrut funds during the 1992 Labor party primary and last year's elections to Histadrut, Israel's largest trade union.

Officials investigating the possible misuse of Histadrut funds plan to question Transport Minister Yisrael Kessar and Labor MK Avi Yehezkel as well.

Deputy Mayor Quits

JERUSALEM — The city's deputy mayor, Meshulam Amit, resigned last Monday after the High Court of Justice rejected his petition against Mayor Ehud Olmert's attempt to fire him.

Amit will continue to serve on city council.

He had charged that Olmert threatened to fire him after Amit raised alleged wrongdoings at City Hall with the mayor.

WORLD

Judaica Returned

BUDAPEST — The remaining 31 pieces of a hoard of stolen Judaica have been returned here.

Authorities in Romania last week brought back the long-awaited package of the Judaica treasure, which was stolen from the Budapest Jewish Museum in December 1993. The last 31 pieces were found in February in an apartment in Bucharest.

In all, 236 pieces of Judaica were found in Romania. The treasure is valued at $200 million.

An investigation into the robbery continues.

Dachau Remembered

BONN — About 2,000 former inmates of Dachau joined some of their American liberators last week to commemorate the 50th anniversary of the liberation of the Nazis' first concentration camp.

The camp was liberated April 29, 1945, by the 42nd Rainbow Division of the U.S. Army.

Established in 1933, Dachau, which is near Munich, served as a model and training ground for Nazi camps throughout Europe.

At least 40,000 prisoners, most of them Jews, died there.

Jewish war vets to be honored by museum

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Canadian War Museum in Ottawa plans to devote an entire wing to honor the achievements and heroism of Canadian Jewish servicemen and servicewomen, the annual dinner of the Jewish War Veterans of Canada was told last week.

The museum, on Sussex Drive, will dedicate a gallery to showcase artifacts, documents and other items designed to counter the belief that Jews have done little to defend this country, said Jewish War Veterans of Canada national commander Sam Pasternack.

The plans are part of an expansion of the museum, which is affiliated with the Canadian Museum of Civilization in Hull, Pasternack said. The dinner marked the 50th anniversary of VE-Day and was attended by some 450 Jewish war veterans, high-ranking police and military officers and members of the diplomatic corps, at Beth Emeth Synagogue.

Jewish war veterans' director Lou Van Delman told The CJN that plans for the gallery also call for a small sanctuary with an eternal flame where prayers may be recited.

According to Canadian War Museum director Victor Suthren, the gallery will be "substantial" — up to 2,000 square feet — and will chronicle Jewish history, the Holocaust and Jewish contribution to war.

"It will serve as an example of inhumanity and help people understand prejudice," Suthren told The CJN.

He said a public fundraising campaign will take place in the Jewish community over the next year to 18 months, with a view to breaking ground for the wing in 1997.

Museum directors have asked the Jewish community to raise $2.5 million toward the building's $11-million expansion, Van Delman said.

In his remarks, Pasternack recounted that 1.5 million Jews served in the Allied armies during World War II, including 17,000 from Canada, "a higher percentage than the national average."

The total included 500,000 Jews from the United States and 16,000 from Palestine, who served in North Africa. As well, Jewish partisans and resistance fighters numbered 100,000. In all, said Pasternack, it was the largest Jewish army since the days of Bar Kochba.

"It's a horrendous lie that Jews did not fight," he said.

Greetings at the dinner were brought by Metro Toronto Police Chief David Boothby and former chief Bill McCormack, who joked he was "honored to represent all the retirees of the Metro Toronto Police force."

Colorfully-clad representatives of the Armed Forces' various branches and regiments joined Jewish war veterans from Canada, Britain, the United States and the Soviet Union. A military band played Jewish favorites.

Medals struck for the Jewish War Veterans of Canada were presented to McCormack and to Maj.-Gen. Bruce Legge, Maj.-Gen. Reginald Lewis and Brig.-Gen. Paul Hayes of the Canadian Armed Forces.

In his remarks, Legge praised the Jewish war veterans. During the war, "Jews were wronged and they fought those who were wrong." He called on the veterans "to keep up the fight and right the wrongs."

Also on hand were consular officials from Great Britain, France, the United States and Israel, as well as representatives from the war veterans' Ottawa post.

Toronto post commander Jack Cahan reminded those present that the Jewish War Veterans distributed some $8,500 in food vouchers to the needy during Passover and Easter.

Bergen-Belsen horrors recalled

By MIRIAM SOBEL
CJN Correspondent

OTTAWA — Alan Rose was a young tank commander with the British army when his unit entered Bergen-Belsen in 1945.

"Bergen-Belsen is beyond description," the former executive vice-president of Canadian Jewish Congress told the standing room only crowd at this year's Yom Hashoah ceremonies in Ottawa. "Only survivors can really tell you what it was like ... But I had seen war in North Africa, Italy, France, Belgium, Holland. Nothing, nothing could prepare you for the scene at Belsen."

Fifty years later, Rose said, he asks himself what we should have learned from that scene.

"First, is that resistance to tyranny is the absolute core democratic value. If the British government and the French government and the Candidates focus on local concerns in riding

ONTARIO ELECTION '95

By AMY SATTIN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jobs and a balanced budget may be the big issues in the upcoming provincial election, but the three candidates in Toronto's St. George-St. David riding have staked their positions around local concerns like rent control and hate crimes.

St. George-St. David, long considered the most economically and culturally diverse riding in the province, has been represented for the last two years by Liberal MPP Tim Murphy, a former lawyer and chair of his party's hate crimes task force.

He is being challenged by two political newcomers: Conservative candidate and former TTC general manager Al Leach; and NDP candidate Rev. Brent Hawkes, a longtime gay community acitivist.

All three are convinced the 40,000 voters in the riding which encompasses both the Rosedale mansions and the tenements of St. Jamestown and Regent Park, will endorse their parties' widely different approaches to taxes, job creation and government spending in the June 8 election.

Where the candidates find common ground, however, is in their pledge to reduce hate-related crime through better education and changes in the legal process.

"Racism doesn't end just by wishing it would go away," said Rev. Hawkes, 44, the openly gay minister of the interfaith Metropolitan Community Church.

St. George-St. David

The St. George-St. David riding is home to North America's second largest gay and lesbian community, located at Church and Wellesley streets, as well as to many visible minorities. It is also home to Holocaust denier Ernst Zundel. There are no major Jewish centres.

Leach, 58, endorses the Conservative pledge to take a hard line on hatemongers. "I don't know why guys like that [Zundel] are allowed to stay in the country," he grumbled. "We have to get tougher on people who take advantage of our democracy."

Murphy, 35, who studied the issue for 18 months before issuing a report earlier in the year, wants to take action through pressuring the attorney general to prosecute all hate crimes, dedicating crown attorneys and police officers for hate-crimes cases and removing the plea bargaining option in hate-related cases.

But the candidates see eye-to-eye on little else. Rev. Hawkes, a self-described "financial conservative," says that while a balanced budget is a necessity, cutbacks must be made "compassionately."

He believes in better health care for the disadvantaged and in employment equity and gay spousal benefits, and would like to see landlord-tenant disputes resolved through quicker arbitration.

"It's not the protections that are wrong, but the bureaucracy that is slow," he said.

Landlord-tenant issues are a hot topic in the riding, where an estimated 75 per cent of residents live in rental units.

Leach supports the end of rent control in order to attract developers, while at the same time pledging to protect tenants' rights.

Murphy would rather see the rent review system modified with incentives in place for building owners to better maintain their properties. "Everyone wants a safe, clean and affordable place to live," he said.

Oakwood gears for hot race

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The provincial election race in the central Toronto riding of Oakwood could prove to be a hot one.

Candidates from the three major parties say the economy is the No. 1 issue in the riding, but the touchy issue of race appears to be a consideration as well.

Oakwood, which occupies the eastern half of the City of York, is a multicultural neighborhood with substantial Italian, Caribbean, Hispanic, Portuguese and Asian communities. There is also a sizeable Jewish population west of Bathurst and along Eglinton Avenue West.

Both NDP incumbent Tony Rizzo and Progressive Conservative candidate Courtney Doldron are accusing their Liberal opponent Mike Colle of stoking the fires of racism by his stand against last summer's Caribbean community celebrations in the Eglinton Avenue area.

CJN Election Coverage

The CJN will focus its election coverage primarily upon ridings with a significant Jewish population. Each week until the election, two or three ridings will be profiled. Occasionally, we may focus on an individual candidate rather than on a specific riding. A discussion with the leaders of the three major parties will appear in the issue of June 1.

In an interview with The CJN, Colle, a former TTC chair and high school teacher, denied race played any part in the controversy.

But Doldron, who faces an uphill battle in the traditionally NDP riding, said he will make race an issue in the campaign. "Mr. Colle used his elected position as Metro councillor to incite racial tension," Doldron asserted.

Doldron, a native of Trinidad, said Colle "portrayed us as beer drinkers and louts who had no regard and would destroy people's property."

Rizzo, a civil engineer, was more muted in his criticism. "There was an ugly incident in the past when the Caribbean community wanted to organize a parade on Eglinton Avenue. It was used as an opportunity by opponents to stir up animosity," he said.

Rizzo, who defeated Liberal Chaviva Hosek in 1990 to reclaim the riding for the NDP, said Colle "stirred up the Italian community to say all sorts of bad things would happen ... It was politically motivated," and designed in part to split him from his Italian constituents.

Colle attempted to deflect the criticism, saying a parade and beer garden were planned without consulting area residents. No one objected to a children's parade but residents and merchants near the proposed beer garden were concerned about noise and parking problems.

"It had nothing to do with racial overtones."

While the candidates split on the festival issue, all agreed that the economy was shaping into the top election concern.

"I've never seen the people so despondent with a sense that things are not getting better," Colle said.

The Liberals promise an efficient, rational approach on finance and administration, he said.

Doldron, a convert who attends Holy Blossom Temple, is stressing the need for a change of government. "We are taxed to death," the school teacher said, adding that part of the Tory platform was to get rid of the health tax on small business and repeal the New Democrat's labor legislation.

Rizzo said his campaign was counting on Oakwood's traditional support for the NDP. "It's a working class riding, so who is the party that best represents their interests and serves them?" he asked rhetorically.

He said he would also rely heavily on his personal record of serving constituents. Area residents are most concerned about employment, he said. "They say, as long as we have a job, we can find a way to pay the taxes."

Rizzo said his No. 1 priority is to push for tax reform to replace property taxes with levies on income. That would help seniors hold onto their houses in low income-earning years. Because of the existing tax burden, higher income taxes would have to be phased in over five to seven years, he said.

Hadassah's relief efforts applauded

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Canada's contribution to the New-York based Hadassah International medical relief association was recognized during a five-day conference last week that brought 250 delegates to Montreal.

Hadassah International, founded a decade ago, builds support for the Hadassah Medical Organization in Israel, to which Hadassah Hospital belongs. The organization has a presence in 30 countries.

Conference coordinator Bernice Tannenbaum of New York told The CJN the event allowed for a free exchange of ideas and social interaction between the 20 nations represented at the conference.

"You are here to make this congress a marketplace of ideas, to turn the vision into a reality," Tannenbaum told participants at the opening dinner.

Canadian Hadassah-WIZO, the organization's representative in Canada for the last four years, hosted the congress, the first ever held in North America.

Funds raised in Canada have been directed towards the purchase of a hi-tech diagnostic machine at Hadassah Hospital. The next Canadian project will support research into the use of discarded umbilical cord tissue in bone-marrow transplantations.

Participating doctors, scientists, academics and volunteers came to the Montreal conference from Argentina, Cuba, Israel, Japan, Morocco, France, Spain and Turkey.

A bank of multilingual translators helped delegates brainstorm on issues like the ethical implications of maintaining medical care in nations with struggling economies.

Membership in Hadassah International is open to men and women, Jews and non-Jews. "Medicine should have no frontiers," Tannebaum said.

Obstacles to peace still seen

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The Gulf States may be next on the list of Arab countries to establish diplomatic ties with Israel, the deputy director of Israel's Foreign Ministry said here recently.

But Yossi Gal, addressing the opening of the U.S.-based Hadassah International's ninth annual congress, said the peace process is still strewn with obstacles.

"Israelis feel — and rightly so — that the peace process cannot be supported unless they have personal security," Gal stated.

In the 18 months since the signing of the Declaration of Principles between Israel and the PLO, 81 Israelis have died in terrorist attacks, Gal said.

"You can't ask [PLO chief] Yasser Arafat for 100 per cent prevention, but we do have the right for 100 per cent effort in fighting terrorism."

Other hurdles Gal said needed to be overcome include the poor economic conditions of Palestinians in Gaza and Jericho; a steady rise in Palestinian opposition to the peace process; and Syria insisting on full Israeli withdrawal from the Golan Heights before agreeing to diplomatic relations.

In the first case, Gal said, Israel has to walk a fine line "between providing security for Israelis or the means to allow Palestinians to feed their families."

The unemployment rate in Gaza normally stands at 50 per cent. That number rises to 90 per cent when terrorist acts launched from Gaza force Israel to close its borders to Palestinians who work there, he said.

Despite these problems, Gal emphasized that a "substantial nucleus of Palestinians" are willing to compromise with Israel in the realization that there's no going back.

"Talks with Palestinians are at their highest point ever," Gal said. "We are meeting every two weeks, and that's a good sign."

He continued by emphasizing the progress made so far. Palestinians are now in charge of tourism, education, health and social services, and taxation in the territories; and Jordan was moved to sign its peace treaty with Israel, he said.

Zundel's 'bunker' torched

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Arson is suspected in a fire that consumed the west half of Holocaust-denier's Ernst Zundel's Carlton Street "bunker" and spread to an apartment building next door.

The fire took place in the early morning hours of May 7, coinciding with VE-Day celebrations. No one was injured in the blaze.

According to workers atop Zundel's house, who were shouting down to Heritage Front leader Wolfgang Droege, who had come to inspect the damage, much of the building's roof was destroyed.

Zundel was in British Columbia at the time of the fire, though his associate, Jerry Neumann, who often accompanied Zundel to court during his two "false news" trials, was in the house. Neumann retrieved a videotape from everpresent surveillance cameras that are perched atop the house that reportedly showed a man pouring a liquid around the front porch.

Some of Zundel opponents from the neighboring Cabbagetown area applauded the arson, though spokespersons for Canadian Jewish Congress took a different view. "We categorically condemn the use of violence," said Gerda Frieberg, chair of Congress' Ontario region. "Zundel is a known hatemonger but if we have grievances we go through the courts."

Political leaders take part in liberation ceremonies

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The leaders of Ontario's three main political parties suspended campaigning on April 30 long enough to mark the 50th anniversary of the end of the Nazi reign and the liberation of the death camps.

The program was sponsored by Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) Ontario region and the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto.

In an emotional address, Rae quoted a passage from the diary of Anne Frank, in which the teenager rues that despite everything that has happened to her, she still believes people are good at heart.

Rae called for racial, ethnic and religious tolerance by all groups. "We are here to reaffirm our commitment to tolerance and diversity."

All three political leaders described trips they have made to Israel. Harris recalled Yad Vashem in Jerusalem, while McLeod added that for her, visiting the Anne Frank House in Amsterdam personalized the Holocaust's impact.

The lessons of the Holocaust, said Jackman, "are not just for Jews. They are for all mankind."

See related stories pages 16 to 19

The gathering also heard from Ontario Citizenship Minister Elaine Ziemba and federal Treasury Board president Art Eggleton, who announced he will visit Israel again in June.

Walter Kersley, who was a young Canadian serviceman during the war, said the "greatest obscenity" he experienced in the conflict was seeing Westerbork, the transit and labor camp in Nazi-occupied Holland that was liberated with help from Canadian troops.

He recalled seeing implements of torture and razors used for shaving corpses. "As long as I'm alive, I'll remember what was done there," Kersley said.

Gerda Frieberg, chair of CJC's Ontario region, recounted her ordeal as an inmate of a concentration camp in Czechoslovakia.

While shovelling mud one day, Frieberg recalled how an airplane dropped leaflets urging the inmates to hang on and not give up.

"That gave us hope, the most precious thing there is," she said.

Sam Pasternack, national commander of the Jewish War Veterans of Canada, said it makes him "livid" to hear that Jews did not serve in the Allied cause. More than 1.5 million Jews from many countries, including Palestine, served in Allied armies, he pointed out.

Many of those present then walked to Convocation Hall at the University of Toronto for a Holocaust commemoration service.

Greetings were brought by Leslie Klein, chair of the continuity committee of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, and Israeli Consul General Dror Zeigerman.

Keynote speaker Frieberg tearfully recalled how the Nazis had threatened to blow up the camp where she was imprisoned, only to abandon it days later.

Dramatic readings in Yiddish, English and Hebrew were given by Allen Farkas, Kate Minsky, Michael Anklewicz and Sharon Eshet, while songs and music came from the Toronto Jewish Folk Choir and the Habonim Youth Ensemble.

Oklahoma bombing possible in Canada: Scheinberg

By MIRIAM SOBEL
CJN Correspondent

OTTAWA — Canada's tradition of political dialogue might not be enough to prevent extremists from committing a mass murder comparable to the bombing of the federal building in Oklahoma City, a parliamentary committee was told last week.

Representing B'nai Brith Canada before the House of Commons foreign affairs committee, Stephen Scheinberg, a Concordia University professor, said although he didn't intend to be alarmist, he believes Canadian extremists could be influenced by their U.S. counterparts.

"Canadian civility is an important barrier against extremism but unfortunately it may not suffice. Our contacts and close ties to the United States and its culture are so immense that Canada cannot be fully insulated from American extremism," he said.

Scheinberg was a co-author of a report, The Extreme Right: International Peace and Security at Risk, which he and fellow authors David Matas and Aurel Braun presented to the Commons committee.

The 400-page report details trends in anti-Semitism, racism and right-wing violence in Britain, Europe and North America. It notes that extremist views are being legitimized by right wing political parties in France, Italy, Austria and Belgium. In Eastern Europe, fragile democracies risk relapsing into extremism.

The report also says that while membership in extreme-right groups is relatively low, the groups have influenced the debate about refugee and immigration policy, abortion and gay rights.

He also warned that extremists from the United States can attach themselves to lobby groups. "Extremists can also be opportunists, and may move into single-issue causes, using them as recruitment vehicles. The militias in the U.S. capitalize on the vehement rejection of gun control by many Americans and carry that issue into something verging on armed rebellion."

The CJC Plenary

This weekend in Montreal more than 1,000 delegates will be gathering for the 24th National Plenary Assembly of the Canadian Jewish Congress. For the organizers, delegates, observers, guests and spokespersons gathering from all parts of this country and other parts of the globe, many old friendships will undoubtedly be renewed, and many new ones undoubtedly struck.

The plenary is an occasion of intellectual, social, emotional, personal and occasionally even religious 'stretching.' One cannot participate passively. The weekend is simply too demanding and the agenda simply too jam-packed with important issues.

For more than 48 hours, in conference rooms, hotel rooms, restaurants, sidewalks, boulevards and cafes, discussion of communal priorities is ubiquitous. Persuasion is the chief objective of discourse; debate its key method. Vital decisions cannot be avoided.

This year delegates will be electing four of the top six executive positions of Congress, including most notably, the position of national president. They must also elect the secretary, the treasurer and the associate chair. And as was reported in The CJN last week, delegates will be asked to examine the very structure and mandate of Congress.

But even as delegates consider updating or revising Congress' mandate, its essence will be always anchored in helping to protect and ensure, as far as human beings are capable, a secure, vibrant, self-sustaining and self-perpetuating Jewish future.

Congress was founded in 1919 to centralize political action on behalf of East European Jewry and to establish the Jewish Immigrant Aid Society. It was not until the mid-1930s however, in response to the awful burdens that developed with the rise of Nazism, that it became a widely-based, centralized force for leadership and community mobilization in Canada.

Every three years the Congress leadership seeks its renewal in its democratic process, its regional, organizational and demographic representativeness, its broad, unifying acceptance among Canadian Jews as the mainstream advocate on matters affecting the rights and well-being of Canadian Jewry.

The theme of the plenary is "Beyond History: Building for a Stronger Future." In a certain sense, this is, indeed must be, Congress' perennial plenary theme. This has also been the theme and the obligation of Jewish existence throughout the generations wherever Jews have settled and organized themselves into a community, measuring communal success not by the extent of what we have inherited from our parents but rather by what we pass on to our children.

Campus life

In an interview which appears in the Viewpoints distributed in this issue of The CJN, outgoing Congress president Irving Abella states the major problem facing Canadian Jewry today in its struggle with assimilation "is in our universities."

With the authority and the insight inspired by his historian's ability to see the longer sweep of events, Abella says:

"Universities are a great wasteland for Canadian Jewry; it is here that we are losing our kids. We're not doing enough for them; we're not supplying them with expertise or funding. Most of them are leaving home for the first time when they enter university; they are then most susceptible to a variety of influences, and we don't provide them with much support."

Abella's words are more than a cause for concern; they are a call to action.

Since the university campus is the field upon which many of our children attempt to plant solid and secure identities for themselves, it is imperative the climate for Jewish life on campus be hospitable to their efforts and experiments. Abella's observations must be examined.

Thus, in this issue of the The CJN we have invited three students — Ilan Gewurz at McGill University, Lori Binder at the University of Manitoba, and Steve Mock at the University of Toronto — to give their views of the state of Jewish life on their respective campuses. In addition, we have published an article by Janice Rotman, planning associate with the Council of Jewish Federations of Canada, of the federations' future plans for improving and enhancing the quality of Jewish life on campus for our children.

History will clear Pollard's name

Millions throughout the world have been protesting Jonathan Pollard's discriminatory prison sentence and have been praying for his release.

According to Jewish tradition, saving a life is like saving an entire world. For thwarting Sadaam Hussein's military plot to create a second Holocaust, the U.S. judicial system branded him a spy. We trust the day will come when truth will prevail, and then he will be clearly recognized as a world renowned humanitarian, and a 20th century Maccabee.

Poles apart

The free world is caught up in the celebration of its victory over the darkest forces of evil in world history 50 years ago.

While the world celebrates, we, the Jewish community, have little to celebrate. Should we be happy because the killing stopped? There are six million reasons why we cannot be happy the killing stopped.

It would have been worse had the killing continued, but that is no reason to celebrate. That is reason to be grateful and appreciative, as indeed we are and must be, to the Allied forces in general, and to the heroic people who risked their lives to win the war, to end the mass and massive murder.

I have just returned from the March of the Living and the silent trek from Auschwitz to Birkenau.

The day before I was at Majdanek. The day before that I was at the Jewish cemetery in Warsaw, which is the final resting place of 250,000 Jews, and which also contains a mass grave for thousands of victims of Nazi cruelty in the Warsaw Ghetto.

Quite likely my grandfather, who had gone to Warsaw to gain the approbation of leading Torah giants for a book he was publishing, the famous treatise on repentance by Meiri, and who never returned, is buried in that mass grave. But I will never really know.

What is it like to go to Poland? How can one not go to Poland, to see the cradle of Ashkenazi Jewry and the giants of our tradition there interred, including Rabbi Moshe Isserles (Ramo), Reb Hayyim of Brisk, Rabbi Naftali Zvi Yehudah Berlin (Netziv).

On the other hand, how can one go to Poland, to the country so steeped in anti-Semitism that it eagerly cooperated with the Nazis in the cold-blooded murder of Jews?

Poland is where so much of our heritage is buried. Poland is the place where our history is held hostage.

There are many people who are doing magnificent things in Poland. The Ronald Lauder Foundation is literally resurrecting Jewry.

A young rabbi, Rabbi Schudrich, with the help of others, runs a Jewish primary school, Jewish community youth clubs, summer and winter retreats, educational centres, Shabbat and seder experiences, and the list goes on.

It is a task that few would dare to undertake, one which is fraught with great difficulty and overwhelming challenge. But someone has to do it and thankfully is doing it.

In the process, Poles who just now are realizing their Jewish roots are trickling in. Poland has the reverse of the North American assimilation problem. The postwar generation has already assimilated. What is left of Jewry in Poland, about 5,000 strong, is mainly quite advanced in years.

But young Poles are learning from whence they came and are striving to embrace Judaism.

Still, if I had my druthers, I would take the rich history that is buried in Poland and bring it to Israel. If I could, I would re-inter the 250,000 Jews in the Warsaw cemetery in a specially constructed new cemetery in Israel.

That is a wild dream, but would it not be the most respectful resting place for these architects of our Jewishness?

And I would love to bring that gigantic urn with Jewish ashes at Majdanek to be buried in Israel. Would that not be the most appropriate and honored burial, to inter our holy martyrs in the sacred soil of Israel?

The killing fields should stay where they are, but the victims belong with the only country and people that would have saved them.

Ever since my return, people have been asking me a terribly complex question — would I urge people to go to Poland, to Majdanek, to Auschwitz, to Birkenau, to Treblinka?

I do not think I could actually urge people to go. But I would insist that if they do go, they should go from there immediately to Israel.

No matter how much anyone thinks they appreciate Israel, that appreciation undergoes a dramatic intensification when coming to Israel from Poland, when going literally from death to life, from the moral abyss to the spiritual epicentre.

Perspectives

Young Jewish voices on Canadian campuses

There is a new buzz-word that has circulated worldwide among Jewish Diaspora community leaders. It seems as if no Jewish community gathering is held today without mentioning the word continuity. Faced with unprecedented rates of assimilation and intermarriage, every Jewish adult organization is struggling to educate and reach out to the youth. The real challenge of our people is to strengthen Jewish identity and convince the next generation that our heritage is relevant in the context of today's realities. Thus, there is no more important place to emphasize the continuity message than on university campuses.

By Ilan Gewurz

University is a critical time in an individual's life. It is a time of tremendous growth, expansion and broadening of ideas, a stage of self-evaluation, during which we reflect upon our very identity and often experiment with new ones. This period, during which values are cemented, is the critical time for the fermentation of the future of Diaspora Jewry. The role of Jewish organizations on campus is, therefore, critical.

Related story on proposed campus services on page 13

How is Jewish identity characterized today on campus? The "Jewish experience" can relate to religious, cultural, ethnic and nationalistic aspects that represent a wide spectrum of attitudes and beliefs. Until recently, Jewish identity on the McGill campus has almost exclusively played a responsive role, focusing mainly on the political sphere. The image of Israel presented by the media during the intifadah left many students wanting to protect Jewish identity on campus and defend their own affiliation with Israel. This solely reactive nature of Jewish identity led many Jewish students who did not agree with the issues, as well as those who were not politically active, to shy away from identifying with their Jewishness.

Furthermore, with the start of the Middle East peace process and Israel's somewhat improved image in the international media, the Jewish issues that students face have become more absolute. As a result, even the defensive and reponsive nature of Jewish identity which once characterized McGill's Jewish students has been silenced. It would seem that the students have been left without a mobilizing force to help reinforce their Jewish identities.

The reality is, however, that the very concept of Jewish identity on McGill campus is in a process of transition, which presents us with a unique opportunity that should not be passed up. The way in which Jewish identity on campus expresses itself is being redefined so that causes other than war and tragedy can give rise to identification. Charlotte Kaiser, president of McGill Hillel, has said that the organization is looking to reach out to broaden its scope next year. It is planning to set up a new committee of representatives from the different campuses in Montreal, in order to get Jewish students more involved.

Yet, if efforts to engage a broader range of Jewish students are to be successful, the expression of Jewish identity must be multifaceted. Jewish students on campus have diverse needs and interests and the Jewish community should seek to provide ways of expressing that diversity. Areas such as social action, culture, the arts, athletics and special interests can be used to express one's Jewishness.

The McGill Jewish community stands at a crossroad, and only if we can introduce the appropriate tools, those that will enhance the Jewishness of students, will Jewish identity on campus emerge strengthened. Jewishness on campus is political, social, cultural and nationalistic. It is only by responding to that diversity with new and innovative ideas, that the struggle for continuity is assured victory.

Term papers, exams and final marks, are only a few elements of the end of the university year — a year which for most students was filled with stress, anxiety and hard work. Going to university is more than a full-time job, making it hard to concentrate on anything else but the latest courses. This is why many students may forget about their Judaism, or may not have time to be involved in Jewish activities during their university career. For the above reasons, university students have been a target group for the community in the battle for Jewish continuity.

By Lori Binder

During university, most students begin to contemplate their future, deciding such things as a future career and goals in life. Students begin to answer the questions of who they are and what they will become. It is crucial that Judaism play a part in this contemplation of the future. It is said that in order to learn anything in life, it is important to learn about who we are first. Judaism should play a part in answering that question. Learning about ourselves means thinking about where we came from, who we are now and where we are going.

Dry Bones

THE PROBLEM OF HOW TO ENSURE JEWISH CONTINUITY
HAS BEEN PASSED ON FROM GENERATION TO GENERATION.
AND, LIKE THE NATIONAL DEBT, MY CHILDREN,
ONE DAY IT'LL BE ALL YOURS!

When approaching university, we cannot stop learning or thinking about our Judaism. Though busy with courses in psychology, biology or economics, we should give a little time to learning about Judaism. Students presently in university will have to pass on their Judaism to future generations.

This does not mean knowing the Talmud backwards and forwards, but rather learning about our Jewish identity so that it can be strengthened. This can be done as easily as by getting involved in a local Jewish student group in the community or on campus. It is there that Jewish students have a chance to interact and learn about each other and, most importantly, it is an opportunity to learn more about Judaism. It is the role of the community at large to be a part of this.

Students may tell you they don't have time to do anything else but course work. With the right community initiative, this need not be the case.

Jewish student groups need to reach further and wider so that we can begin to reach those students who have not had a chance to be involved in anything Jewish. We need to let students know that there are Jewish resources on campus and in the community, thus reaching above and beyond the core group. The greater the number of students who are active in Jewish life on campus, the stronger the community we will be creating for the future.

As the school year comes to an end, I think of the many students who have become active in Jewish student and communal activities here in Winnipeg. They have begun to take part in their future. Over the past few years I have seen many students attend national Jewish student programs in other cities and return home as leaders. These students then help get other students involved, increasing the core group. This situation is not unique to Winnipeg; it is happening on many other campuses in Canada. As we look forward to the year ahead, we must focus on involving many more students for the years to come. We must ensure that there is a strong community for our present and future generations.

Some student activist once coined the expression, "the campus is a microcosm of society," which contains a kernel of truth. Student life tends to reflect, and often magnify, the trends apparent in the larger community. Lately, Jewish student life has served that purpose all too well.

By Steve Mock

The Jewish community is in a state of flux, as old programs and services are no longer needed. The process of change has affected students, as we find our sources of funding shifting, or in some cases, drying up entirely.

Students have very little disposable income to fill the void. It is easy for active students to blame loss of funding for the decline of their organizations, but this is a simplistic approach. Student organizations have also failed to adjust to changes in the needs of Jewish students — changes that parallel those within the wider community.

While the Jewish community has been unmatched in its ability to mobilize students for an important cause such as support for Israel, lobbying for Soviet Jews or demonstrating against anti-Semitism, in the area of Jewish student activism, change has been felt most acutely — peace, freedom and acceptance have sabotaged the student community's efforts to organize.

I oversimplify. Israel still requires our support in myriad ways, Jews and non-Jews around the world still need political help, and Holocaust denial and left-wing anti-Semitism are slowly creeping into the realm of respectability. Nowhere are these issues more evident than on university campuses. Nonetheless, Jewish students have found themselves without a unifying war cry.

Many student organizations have taken the lead from the community and jumped on the continuity bandwagon. Nonetheless, funding for students has continued to vanish, much to the frustration of the few remaining active students. How can a community so concerned with continuity pull funding from youth and student organizations?

Two facts are being ignored by these students. First of all, students will not join a club whose only purpose is to get more people to join the club. Undue stress on continuity as an issue turns Judaism into just such a club. More significant is the fact that the community will be unlikely to fund student groups that do not produce anything tangible in return.

Religious voices in the community would suggest that the response should be to develop a more constructive rather than reactive Judaism. Indeed, they are right. A Judaism that depends on continual crises for identity to be maintained is highly unstable, and no organization based on such an approach can remain relevant for long. However, the future of Judaism in Canada does not depend on how many dorm-rooms are kept kosher, any more than it depends on how many bodies can be brought together for a rally. The future depends on making a Jewish identity something that no student could have a reason to give up.

Students go to university to expand their experiences and meet new people different from themselves. While this does not require severing ties to one's old identity group, neither does it require maintaining them. For this reason, even students who were active in Jewish youth groups find themselves entirely uninvolved in university. Waving the banner of continuity in their faces can only exacerbate the problem. These students must be given a reason to associate with Jewish organizations, or Jewish organizations do not deserve them.

Jewish student organizations no longer have unifying political issues to rally around. Rather, students have to seek out the issues that are most important to them as individuals and take the initiative to become active. If the Jewish community wants these students to develop an interest in Jewish issues, community organizations must seek student volunteers and employees more actively. If Jewish student groups want to remain relevant, they must work to connect students to the community activities most suited to them. They can serve as resources, helping Jewish students apply the skills they have learned and the values with which they were raised to the community in which they live.

Only then will the Jewish community see that Jewish student life has not vanished — that there is, in fact, a constituency of bright and dedicated Jewish young adults who still need support if Jewish continuity is to be a reality. It is only then that the funding necessary to maintain Jewish student organizations will be forthcoming.

Remembering VE-Day

During these last weeks and months we have all had a chance to think about the events 50 years ago. Over and over I have been asked to speak about them, which has given me ample opportunity to think just what mattered most to me.

By Rabbi Carmiel Plaut

Do I think above all of the thousands of dead or was it the barely alive skeletons that crawled towards us when we entered the camp at Dora? These images flash before my eyes from time to time; they are brought up and then repressed. But what remains is a theology that was developed out of the experience.

No one who was ever there — either as an inmate or as a liberator — could avoid a confrontation with his or her traditional faith. Was this all willed by God, and were human beings merely automatons in the Divine hand? Or did God have nothing to do with any of this? Many books have been written about this difficult subject and I suspect none of them can ever give an answer that will be truly satisfying. For when we are faced with the unimaginable, all rational thought comes up against a barrier that cannot be breached.

After all, whenever we speak of God we are speaking of Mystery. Torah and tradition, philosophers and theologians have given us clues as to the nature of the Divine mind, but in the end, as the Torah says, we cannot "see God and live." Ultimately, what is required is an act of faith, no less and no more. Either one believes that all the world is an accident, a random development of patterns, cells and natural selection, or one believes that guiding it all is a plan beyond human imagination, a plan willed and executed by the One we call God.

Rational thought comes up against a barrier

But what does this have to do with the Holocaust? What did this have to do with the dead that were lying there and the pitiful survivors we saw?

Over the months and years, I have often thought about this and — at the expense of simplifying a very complicated subject — I will put it this way:

I continue to believe that God is the source upon Whom I call, who strengthens me and gives me hope. I also believe that this God has given me (and to all human beings) freedom of will — something that arises out of the act of creating the human species. The tale of Adam and Eve tells it all: the moment they were created they were given the opportunity to obey or defy the Divine will. That freedom — used or misused — has been the ground of human existence. From the Roman crucifictions to the Nazis and the disaster in Oklahoma City, this freedom has been forever misused. I believe that Divine power would not have changed the will of Hitler, but that same Power was always present to be chosen as guide and inspiration for such change.

Some have called this concept an act of Divine withdrawal from the world. I will not weigh you down with this kind of philosophic language. I believe the Nazis cut themselves free from Divine restraints and therefore, what I saw at Dora was not God's work but theirs.

To me God is the constant Presence, the Opportunity, the Challenge to do the right thing. I pray not to change God's mind but to make myself ready to do what I understand to be my task.

In Dora, I renewed my unshakable loyalty to my people and I prayed to God to give me understanding. I will never have the fullness of it, but I always remember Isaiah's observation: "Seek the Eternal — and in the seeking you will find."

An economic revolution

Israel's Independence Day, Yom Ha'atzmaut, is traditionally a day of celebration and reflection. In some ways, one might argue, things are not much different than they were 20 years ago . . . Hussein is still the king of Jordan, Yasser Arafat is still chairman of the PLO, and Hafez al-Assad still rules in Syria. But the reality of Israel is that very little in 1995 resembles the situation in 1975. Three areas deserve particular attention: the country's population, its international standing and its economic growth.

By Shira Herzog

In 1975, Israel's population was 3.5 million. In 1995, it is 5.6 million — more than that of Denmark or Norway. Between 1975 and 1995, Israel absorbed one million immigrants, mostly from the former Soviet Union. These "new Israelis" are just beginning to come into their own as an influential community. Their full potential in economic and social terms has yet to be expressed.

In 1975, a rock-bottom year in Israel's international relations, 75 member nations of the United Nations voted for the infamous "Zionism is Racism" resolution. Last year, that resolution was repealed. Of the 75 countries that voted for it, 65 have already established full diplomatic relations with Israel, while an additional five have established lower-level ties. In total, Israel currently has diplomatic relations with 154 countries, while the increase in its international trade over the last year has come mainly from Muslim and Asian nations.

The most important development in this regard relates to the defence budget. In 1975, 33 per cent of Israel's gross domestic product (GDP) was dedicated to national defence. In 1995, that percentage has dropped to nine per cent. In 1975, the GDP stood at $12 billion — half of the combined GDP of Egypt, Syria, and Jordan, all of whom were in a state of war with Israel. In 1995, Israel's GDP stands at $85 billion — 50 per cent bigger than the combined GDP of those same countries. In the meantime, Egypt and Jordan have signed peace treaties with Israel, while Syria has moved towards the difficult route of negotiations as well.

Increase in trade mainly from Muslim, Asian nations

In a recent report, the U.S.-based investment banking house, Lehman Brothers wrote: "Often classified as an emerging market, in many ways the Israeli market has already emerged." Lehman Brothers was referring to the unusual combination of high economic growth indicators and a stable economic infrastructure that Israel offers potential investors. However, the "emergence" of the Israeli market in the eyes of many foreign investors is rooted in fundamental, socio-economic changes that have been described by some economic analysts as a veritable revolution.

Israel's economic growth story has been told many ways over the last several years, as international investment banks have recommended its inclusion in international investment portfolios. The statistics speak for themselves: In 1975, Israel exported $1.8 billion worth of goods. In 1995, it will export $18 billion worth. In fields such as telecommunications, electronics and software, Israel is a significant international player. Government spending on research and development on a per-capita basis is higher than in any of the G-7 countries.

These figures mask a huge shift in lifestyle for Israelis, especially for the burgeoning middle-class. In 1975, only one-third of Israeli families owned a car. Today, 75 per cent of Israeli households own a car. In 1975, 280,000 Israelis, or eight per cent of the population, travelled abroad. In 1995, two million Israelis, or 36 per cent of the population, will travel abroad. From one, government-owned television channel in 1975, Israelis now have a choice of 40 cable channels.

The economic and political facts have yet to be translated into a new form of national self-awareness. Israeli social observers bemoan the growing materialism of their community, but they have not yet fully understood the enormous social impact of these seminal changes. The founding generation of Israelis transformed sand dunes into urban settlement and created the basic ingredients for security. The second generation of Israelis created a thriving, progressive western economy, and brought shopping malls and hi-tech to the suburbs. The third generation of Israelis, who are maturing into adulthood as Israel celebrates its 47th anniversary, will have the challenge of creating new values, new norms, and perhaps even new symbols that will reflect their changed environment.

Good OLD Mom

Once upon a time, I was the youngest. The youngest essay contest winner. The youngest girl to get contact lenses. The youngest police reporter.

By Erica Meyer Ranzin

Alas, I'm not the youngest anymore.

Then, for a pretty long stretch, I was right in the middle: the same age as my neighbors and friends. I was 30-something from 27 well into my 40s. I was right in the middle age — literally and comparatively — among moms at my two daughters' school events.

But today, alas, I went to a party held by my son's pre-kindergarten class and I made a terrible discovery. In a room full of parents with 5-year-old offspring, I'm the oldest mom. (I would not, however, be the oldest dad.)

The oldest mommy. The senior. The mature one. The one closest to having a double chin. The one who really wants to sit down while everyone is dancing. The one who gets the heartburn from food cooked by a gang of 5 year olds who think kosher rules allow freshly cooked dishes to contain a certain percentage of sand, tempra paint, and lollypop sticks.

I was wearing a denim skirt that was probably older than any other female in the room. Skirt? I have lipstick older than some of these women.

This is true, in part, because many of the children in my son's class are their mothers' first child, while my little guy is my baby. Lots of the other mothers were holding infants as they watched their 5 year olds perform.

Still, these ladies are lithe, limber and lean while I am, well, not.

They have utility vehicles painted sporty colors; I have a van.

They have careers, or at least careers on hold. Mine hung up and went home.

They know Elvis Costello; I know Elvis. They remember Wings with nostalgia; I remember the Beatles on Ed Sullivan. They know how to program the VCR; I know that I Love Lucy is supposed to be in black and white.

I have been to the mirror and accepted the wrinkles around my eyes. I no longer party hearty till dawn, not unless I can sleep deep until noon.

Understand, I'm not really complaining here. I feel my age, but I don't dislike it. I earned it.

There are some benefits. I am old enough to appreciate, deeply, daily, having a healthy, happy little boy. I am old enough to take a nap when I need one (or when he does). I have been a mother long enough not to panic at every nosebleed or childhood defeat. A certain sense of perspective comes with age and experience, and I welcome it.

Our children are older as a group, also. The three of them are finally reaching an age span when we can plan big family trips, just as my husband and I are finally reaching the age when we have the vacation time to take them.

Finally, it dawns on me that when my kindergarten kid is bar mitzvah, these women will still have maternity clothes in their closets, tricycles in their hallways, and frogs in their washing machines. When my guy's driving himself to high school, they'll still be in the carpool line at the elementary. They look great now, but just catch them in a few years. With any luck at all, you won't be able to catch me.

A clash of civilizations?

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Within 24 hours of the devastating terrorist car bombing of a U.S. federal building in Oklahoma City last month, the media pounced on the notion that Islamic fundamentalists may have been at fault.

As it turned out, these allegations were unfounded. But the fact that they were raised underscores the prevailing skittishness about Islamic fundamentalism in the United States and elsewhere.

The nervousness is linked to a strong perception, grounded in previous events, that Islamic fundamentalism poses a threat to American interests, both at home and abroad.

The 1979 hostage crisis at the U.S. Embassy in Iran, the 1983 truck bombing of the American embassy in Beirut, the 1988 destruction of a Pan-American airliner over Scotland, and the 1993 bombing of the World Trade Center in Manhattan were all the work of Muslim extremists.

Israel has reason to be wary and vigilant, too.

Since September 1993, when Israel and the PLO signed the Declaration of Principles officially ending their state of war, 65 civilians and soldiers have been killed in a series of suicide bombings perpetrated by Hamas and Islamic Jihad.

And in southern Lebanon, the Israeli army is embroiled in a deadly struggle with Hezbollah, whose chief objective is nothing less than the transformation of Lebanon into an Islamic state.

The forces of Islamic fundamentalism are also on the ascendancy in several key Arab/Muslim countries:

•Algeria is torn by a savage civil war where the death toll approaches 40,000. If Algeria falls, will Morocco and Tunisia be next?

•Egypt — the first Arab nation to sign a peace treaty with Israel — is convulsed by an Islamic rebellion, not its first but arguably its most serious in modern times. If the fundamentalists succeed in ousting President Hosni Mubarak's government, they will doubtless break diplomatic relations with Israel and trigger a crisis of enormous proportions.

•Turkey — the first Muslim country to disestablish Islam, a model of secularism and a member of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) — is beset by a rising tide of Islamic fundamentalism. In recent local elections, Islamic candidates wrested control of Istanbul, Ankara and other municipalities.

These developments have not gone unnoticed in Europe. Recently, the secretary-general of NATO, Willy Claes, claimed that Islamic fundamentalism is as much a threat to the West as communism once was.

Claes may have been exaggerating. But the looming confrontation between the West and Islamic fundamentalism looks more and more like a "clash of civilizations," as political theorist Samuel Huntington has suggested.

Essentially, Islamic extremism is an outgrowth of a Muslim revival that has swept through the Middle East, Asia, Africa and even Europe (Bosnia) since the 1980s.

The resurgence is most evident in Iran, where an Islamic revolution occurred in 1979, driving out the pro-Western Pahlavi monarchy. Since then, Iran has become a theocratic state (ruled by a council of mullahs), a patron of Islamic militants from Sudan to Indonesia (the most populous Muslim nation), and an example to emulate.

Sudan — the largest country in Africa — has followed in Iran's path. In June 1989, a military coup brought Gen. Omar Bashir to power, and he and his eminence grise, Hassan Turabi, have transformed Sudan into a full-fledged Islamic state.

The Islamic revival in the Muslim world is characterized by increased attention to religious observance (mosque attendance, prayer and fasting) and more emphasis on Islamic dress and values.

As John Esposito has noted, the recurrent themes of this movement are (1) a sense that the existing political, economic and social systems have failed; (2) a disenchantment with, or rejection of, the West; and a (3) conviction that Islam provides an all-encompassing ideology for state and society and a viable alternative to nationalism, socialism and capitalism.

At the heart of the Islamic revival is a fervent belief that the Muslim world suffers from weakness, caused by its departure from the straight path of Islam.

As Hrair Dekmejian points out, Muslim revivalism usually emerges during periods of great turmoil. Two examples will suffice: the precipitous decline of the Ottoman Empire in the 19th century and the humiliating defeat of the Arabs by Israel in the 1967 Six Day War.

Islamic radicals hold that Islam and the West are locked in an intractable battle, sharpened over the centuries by the Crusades, European colonialism and the rise of Zionism.

Antipathy to Israel is the common thread which binds Islamic fundamentalists, whether expressed by the president of Iran or the leaders of Hamas.

Casting a wide net, Islamic fundamentalism is most pronounced among the lesser educated, the unemployed, the peasantry and the new class of urban workers facing housing shortages and a scarcity of social services.

Whether in the Gaza Strip, Cairo or Istanbul, Islamic fundamentalism thrives on poverty and underdevelopment, both of which distort Muslim societies.

Scholars who've studied the phenomenon say that its appeal is multifaceted.

Islamic fundamentalism bestows a new identity on persons who've lost their spiritual bearings; defines society and its problems in unambiguous terms; provides an emotional outlet against the established order, which is perceived as venal and corrupt; and promises a better life in a future Islamic utopia, on earth if not in heaven.

Yet its allure is not merely on the rhetorical level. Invariably, Islamic movements win popularity by offering free social, medical and educational services, thereby filling a void left by widely detested governments.

Today, Islamic fundamentalism is making headway in Algeria, Egypt, Turkey and Lebanon.

Law and order have drastically deteriorated in Algeria — a former French colony — since the Islamic Salvation Front (ISF) was robbed of certain victory in a general election. After the ISF won the first round in 1991, the secular government panicked, cancelling the second round slated for 1992. Enraged, the ISF and its allies struck back.

For the past three years, radical Islamic factions, some of whose fighters were trained in Afghanistan during the war against the Soviet Union, have waged a bloody campaign of retribution. They have murdered a state president, as well as civil servants, members of the security apparatus and judiciary, intellectuals, journalists, unveiled women and foreigners. French and Arab mediation efforts have failed.

Sectarian warfare rages in Egypt, where the biggest opposition party, the Muslim Brotherhood, is outlawed. Islamic gunmen, who killed Anwar Sadat in 1981, have targeted government officials, cabinet ministers and intellectuals. Not even Nobel Prize laureate Naguib Mahfouz is immune to the spiralling violence. An attempt was made on his life in 1994.

Accompanied by Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, Prime Minister Tancu Ciller of Turkey reviews an Israeli honor guard in Jerusalem.

Egypt has launched a concerted offensive against the rebels, particularly in Upper Egypt, and military courts have sentenced to death 62 Islamic radicals. But widespread disillusionment with the Mubarak regime, reflected in Egypt's appalling poverty and freewheeling corruption, have worked to the fundamentalists' advantage.

In Turkey, governed by Prime Minister Tancu Ciller, the upsurge of Islamic fervor is a function of a worsening economy and a profusion of scandals. In the last municipal elections, the Welfare party swept to victory in more than 400 races.

Led by Necmettin Erbakan, a politician who has attacked Jews and Israel, the Welfare party offers a nostalgic vision of a "Just Order." Should Erbakan defeat Ciller (who, in 1994, was the first Turkish leader to visit Israel), he may well try to repeal the historic secular reforms implemented by Kemal Ataturk in the 1920s, thus setting Turkey on a radically different course.

In Lebanon, which is still recovering from a long civil war, Hezbollah (Party of God) is active on two fronts. On the battlefield, Hezbollah fights Israel and its surrogate, the South Lebanon Army. In the political arena, Hezbollah has won seats in parliament.

Clearly, Hezbollah is a force to be reckoned with, especially in a country still emerging from the nightmare of fratricidal conflict.

The Holocaust in print

Fifty years have elapsed since the end of World War II. Here, in capsule form, are reviews of books about the Holocaust and the war.

The Anatomy of the Nuremberg Trials (Random House, $45 hardback and $22.95 US in paperback) is a masterful account of that event by Telford Taylor. He sets the scene, analyzes the proceedings and describes the protagonists.

In The Text of the Holocaust (Micah Publications, $10), C.C. Aronsfeld argues that Hitler always intended to exterminate the Jews of Europe. He develops this thesis by exposing Nazi propaganda from 1919 to 1945.

Richard Bolchover, in British Jewry and the Holocaust (Cambridge University Press, $44.95), examines the reactions of that community to the Holocaust. A comprehensive though succinct work.

Few Jewish children survived the Holocaust. In The Hidden Children (Thomas Allen, $24.95), Howard Greenfeld skillfully tells the story of 13 survivors.

The Terezin concentration camp devoured 15,000 Jewish children under the age of 15. I Never Saw Another Butterfly (Pantheon Books, $14 US) is a poignant collection of drawings and poems by some of the hapless victims.

In Did The Children Cry? (Hippocrene Books, $24.95 US), Richard Lukas recounts Nazi Germany's crusade against Jewish — and Christian — children in Poland from 1939 to 1945. A strong book.

Some light pierced the darkness of the Holocaust. In Heroes of the Holocaust (London Books, $14.95), Arnold Geier relates 28 tales of human kindness and valor amid brutality and cowardice.

What happened to American Jews, particularly soldiers, who fell into Nazi hands? Mitchell Bard's Forgotten Victims (Westview Press, $19.95 US) may surprise you.

After the war, the Soviet Union recruited Jewish survivors to de-Nazify Poland. Excesses were apparently committed, and it is this topic which John Sack ponders in his controversial book, An Eye For An Eye (HarperCollins, $31).

The Oxford Companion to World War II (Oxford University Press, $73.95) may be the definitive work on this subject. Vast in scope, with 300 photos, maps and diagrams, it brims over with 1,750 entries. The essay on the Holocaust is exemplary in its thoroughness.

Code Name: The Long Sobbing (Simon Wiesenthal Center, $29.95 US) is a riveting scrapbook of photographs and memorabilia of 1944, a pivotal year in the war.

Ponderous and weighty, The Holocaust in American Films (Jewish Publication Society, no price listed) by Judith Doneson is simply too academic in style to be accessible.

David Irving has been exposed as a Holocaust denier. Now, in David Irving's Hitler (Ben-Simon Publications, $6.95), he is raked over the coals yet again, this time by German historian Eberhard Jackel.

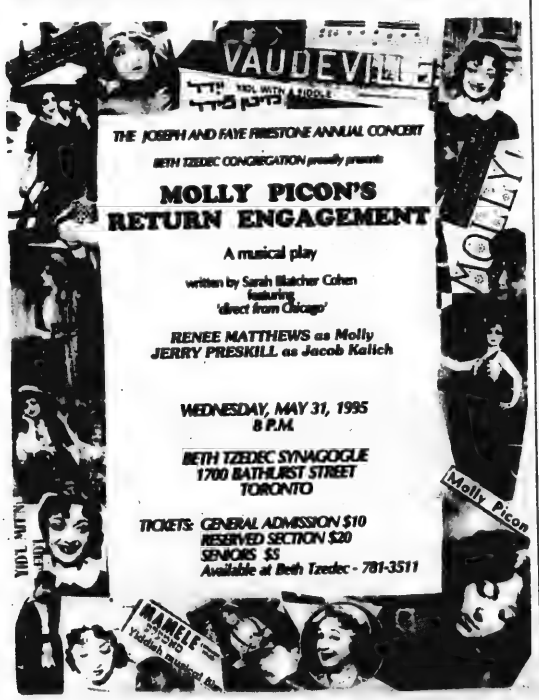
55 Yeomans Road, Downsview, (416) 633-5500



By RABBI KENNETH KATZ

A division exists among rabbis about homosexuality. Some believe that the time has come to declare, in effect, that homosexuality is no sin. Others maintain that, since the Torah says explicitly, "Do not lie with a male as one lies with a woman, it is an abhorrance" (Leviticus 18:22), homosexuality is forbidden to Jews.

These stricter rabbis maintain that male homosexuals, and perhaps lesbians as well, should be treated by the Jewish community as a special case — at most, barred from the rabbinate and teaching positions, at least treated as other violators of the Torah, like those who do not keep kosher or observe the Sabbath — with compassion if suffering from AIDS, but in general, kept in the closet. Some rabbis even say, "Why discuss the issue at all? The Torah is explicit. 'Do not lie with a male' couldn't be clearer." Then why is the issue even being discussed?

I am not going to resolve the issue of the Jewish view of homosexuality in this column. But I want to state clearly why I think the Torah demands that we discuss the question. To understand this is to see how our "Torah system" should work. This has to do with three verses in the Torah that should become familiar to every Jew, that we should be able to quote from memory. These verses function like the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, a standard against which to compare everything else in the Torah. Here they are:

"And God created man in His image, in the image of God He created him; male and female He created them" (Genesis 1:27). This verse means that every human being, man and woman, somehow resembles God — perhaps through the power of speech or thought or compassion. The Torah is saying that every person has dignity just because they are a person.

"You shall not wrong a stranger or oppose him, for you were strangers in the land of Egypt" (Exodus 23:20). This means that one must consider the other person's situation in life or point of view. We Jews know very well what it means to be a stranger, and straight Jews need to wonder what it must be like to be gay.

"Justice, justice shall you pursue ." (Deuteronomy 16:20). Notice that the Torah says pursue, not wait for, think about or stroll after. Surely there is a question of justice here.

It happens in the course of history that our sense of right and wrong develops. The Torah speaks of a world with slavery and death penalties. It describes these things as explicitly as it says that a man shall not lie with another man. And yet as our sense of right and wrong developed, we changed and came to feel that slavery and death penalties were unjust, uncompassionate to those who were different than we were and an affront to human dignity. It is easy to look back and see how we used our "Charter of Rights and Freeedoms" verses to abolish them. It is harder to ask whether these three verses should now move us to change traditional views of homosexuality, even if elsewhere the Torah says, "Do not lie with a male." And yet our developing sense of right and wrong seems to demand just that.

You shall not wrong a stranger ... God created Man in His image ... Justice ... Do not lie with a male as one lies with a woman. These verses are in collision. It is not obvious how to resolve the clash, but I think our traditional "Torah system" now demands that we face it.

By RENA ZAYIT

When I was a child, my Uncle Ralph was the uncle who told us funny stories, bought us chocolate ice cream cones and showed us Walt Disney cartoons.

GUEST VOICES

When asked about his war-time experiences, he always answered that it was a very long time ago and that he was not very important.

Even now, when he and other veterans have been invited by the Dutch government to commemorate the liberation of that country 50 years ago by Canadian troops, he is still reticent about his role.

Ralph Torontour served in the 4th Medium Artillery Regiment, whose heavy guns supported the 2nd and 3rd Canadian Divisions.

Uncle Ralph's regiment was French-Canadian and he was the only Jew. When asked about anti-Semitism, he says, "People are anti-Semitic because people are always afraid of what they do not understand.

"Sometimes I gave them an impromptu lecture or else I became physical. It was fortunate that I was bigger than most of them."

As a technical assistant, Uncle Ralph calculated the necessary calibre of ammunition. In the final days of the war, he helped open up the supply route through Arnhem and continued into Holland.

Because the Canadians advanced so quickly, they were open not just to enemy fire but to friendly fire from Canadian Lancaster planes and American flying fortresses.

"The hardest time was when our own planes came out and bombed us on the road to Falaise," Uncle Ralph says with tears in his eyes. "I still remember picking up the dog tags of soldiers in my own regiment who had been killed from those bombings."

The arrival of the First Canadian Army was just in the nick of time. Uncle Ralph was not involved in the liberation of the camps, but remembers meeting Jews hiding in a basement of an Antwerp synagogue.

Ralph Torontour

"I rapped on a side window of a boarded up door and showed the man inside the Magen David I always wore. The man stared at me and asked: 'Es-tu Juif? Quelle armie?' The Germans had already searched the synagogue. I told him in French that we were Canadians and the Germans had gone. I did not know then what had happened to the Jews. Had I known what I know now I would have been much more cruel to the Germans."

Uncle Ralph remembers being told the story of a 6-year-old girl who had tried to run away when the Gestapo came to the house. "A man ran after and pulled her back by the hair to the trucks," he says. "This same fellow had opened a bistro in Antwerp. I gathered together some men in my unit and told them he was a collaborator and we beat him with the only weapon we had, thick belts with heavy buckles. We made minced meat out of him, but really it was not enough."

My relatives used to tell me about sending food parcels and knitted clothes to my uncle overseas. When I ask him what he did with their knitted hats and homemade cookies, he makes a strange sound.

"I met so many children and adults who had come out of the camps with bloated stomachs. I was lucky and I received a lot of parcels. I used to give them to the Canadian army rabbi, Rabbi Cass, and he would divide them up amongst the starving Yiddish people."

Uncle Ralph has special memories, like the one of attending the first post-war Yom Kippur service at the Royal Opera House in Amsterdam "and seeing it packed with Jews," but shrugs away any suggestion that his actions were exceptional.

"I did not do anything special," he says. "I got my medals for being there from 1939-45. I was just there."

Federation Council plans to update campus services

By JANICE ROTMAN
Special to The CJN

In an effort to strengthen Jewish continuity and identity among Jewish youth, the Council of Jewish Federations of Canada (CJFC) has embarked on a strategic, long-range plan to organize, finance and deliver campus services across Canada.

The next six months will mark a critical stage in CJFC's initiative to develop a national model for Jewish campus youth. The initiative has included comprehensive studies, the creation of a national student body (called the National Campus Coordinating Forum), and funding through CJF of both individual campus groups and such national delivery organizations as Jewish Student Network and the Canada Israel Foundation for Academic Exchanges.

Over the past three years, conference consultations have been held with students, campus professionals and federation leaders, in the final phase of the initiative, to produce a plan to ensure the organization, funding and delivery of Jewish campus services across Canada.

In the 1994-95 school year, the CJFC campus planning committee was directed to develop a service model that would ensure an optimum standard of service.

Committee chair Ted Medzon says the local communities will continue to have the daily responsibility for supporting programs on leadership development, advocacy, anti-Semitism, Israel, social issues, observance of holidays and religious practice. But obviously, not all communities have the same financial, professional and other resource capacities.

The national model will supplement local communities with consultation and pooled national funds. Then, if a student from London goes to school in Saskatoon and another student comes from Halifax to the University of Toronto, they both have an equal chance to affiliate and identify with other Jews both on and off campus. The national Jewish community, through its federations and affiliates, has agreed that it must provide these services as an integral element in ensuring Jewish continuity.

In the conferences held during the three years leading up to the creation of the campus model, many concerns overlapped. At the first conference students expressed feelings of isolation and lack of connection to program ideas, leadership development, Jewish services on campuses, access to national and international information and support.

As a partial response to these concerns a Program Idea Exchange and later a Canadian National Jewish Student Resources Manual were created through the CJFC office and sent to all campuses and local Jewish communities. A separate, updated listing of contact people on each campus was also distributed.

Jewish campus professionals wished for greater recognition of their expertise and importance, and for creation of professional networks and ongoing training. Jewish communal leaders stated that campus concerns have a high priority and that a combination of new and redistributed funds will have to be spent on assisting Jewish students nationwide.

The challenge is to create a campus model that addresses the needs of Jewish students, campus professionals and the national and local communities, in an orderly and cost efficient way. Such a comprehensive system might require the reordering of national responsibility for services to Jewish campus groups, but ultimately this will ensure a national support system for students who want to connect Jewishly within the university and college system. How quickly this can be achieved will depend upon finding creative ways of locating new human resources and redirecting existing national and local dollars.

Now in draft stage, the model and budget proposal for national service to Jewish campus students will be presented to the CJFC by the national campus planning committee in June. Consultations will be carried out at the local community and student level in advance of the June CJFC board meeting.

Congress awards announced

MONTREAL — Community leaders will be presented awards at the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) plenary, to be held here May 14 and 15.

Former CJC executive vice-president Alan Rose of Montreal and Toronto's David Satok, a long-time member of CJC national and Ontario region executives, will be presented the Samuel Bronfman Medals, awarded annually to those who have rendered distinguished service to CJC and the Jewish community.

Rose, now a member of Canada's Immigration and Refugee Board, will also be honored at a special havdalah service May 13.

Judy Feld Carr of Toronto, head of the National Task Force for Syrian Jews, will receive the Saul Hayes Human Rights Award for her role in the rescue of Syria's remaining Jews.

Donald Carr of Toronto, a member of CJC's national executive and active in many community endeavors, will receive the Sam Filer Distinguished Service Award, given to a CJC or a current community leader.

Gary Goldsand, a student at the University of Calgary, will be presented with the Brian A. Finestone Memorial Award, while Andrea Silverstone, immediate past chair of Jewish Students' Network Canada, will receive the Monroe Abbey Memorial Award.

The Finestone and Abbey awards provide financial assistance to help deserving persons between 25 and 40 years of age attend the plenary, as well as recognize past involvement and encourage future participation in CJC.

Finally, Andrea Bronfman will receive the Award of Merit on May 14 in recognition of her contribution to the Canadian Jewish community through the exhibit A Coat of Many Colors: Two Centuries of Jewish Life in Canada. The exhibit traveled to nine Canadian cities as well as Tel Aviv and New York.

Ex-diplomat blasts Labor

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A former Israeli diplomat recently delivered a scathing attack on the country's Labor-led government, arguing its senior leadership was so driven by the desire to make a deal with the Palestinians that it was shutting its eyes to the awful reality of the situation.

"The reality and the promises are different and the reality is bloody," said Yitschak Ben-Gad, a former consul general to the Midwestern United States.

Israeli leaders are not showing enough "backbone" in negotiating with the Arabs, he said. Ben-Gad ridiculed Israeli Prime Minster Yitzhak Rabin, saying he has changed his mind so often on key issues he was acting like "a yo-yo."

Speaking to about 50 people at a meeting sponsored by Herut-Likud Canada, Ben-Gad said Rabin promised a bright future without bloodshed or war. Instead, more than 100 Israelis have been killed and more than 350 wounded since Israel and the PLO initialled the Oslo agreement.

Ben-Gad ridiculed a number of Labor Knesset members, saying Shulamit Aloni has suggested giving part of the Negev desert to the Palestinians because they are short of territory. Arab lands are 640 times the size of Israel, he said incredulously.

Rabin, meanwhile, has moved in the direction of his left wing coalition partners, Mapam, and appears to be reversing his pre-election pledge that the Golan Heights is too important to Israel's security to give up. Rabin has no mandate to turn the heights over to Syria, Ben-Gad contended.

A former deputy mayor of Netanya, Ben-Gad said the PLO and Islamic fundamentalists are working hand in hand against Israel. "[Palestinian leader Yasser] Arafat would like the fundamentalists to kill Jews, but he doesn't want it said they came from Gaza."

The more Israelis killed, the greater the concessions Arafat can wrest from the Israeli government, Ben-Gad argued.

A native of Tripoli, Libya, Ben-Gad said recent polls show Likud leading Labor in popularity by 42 per cent to 37. He said "the peace process should be stopped or at least delayed," as long as Jews are being killed in terror attacks. And he rejected any suggestion that Israel withdraw to the "dangerous lines of 1967.

"We believe a strong Israel with defensible borders is the best guarantee for security ... Peace can only be achieved through a position of strength," he said.

Dance for Watkin raises research funds

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The traditional way of memorializing someone who has died is with tzedakah. For young Orly Watkin, it was only fitting that this should be combined with dance.

Orly died suddenly of meningitis last May, at the age of 15. Two days before, the girl who loved to dance won four gold medals at a regional dance competition at York University.

Her heartbroken father, Shlomo, described himself as "obsessed" with the need to raise money for meningitis research. He established the Orly Watkin Meningitis Research Fund at Sunnybrook Health Science Centre, but wanted to do more.

On April 23, a dance competition called Dance for Orly, held at the Minkler Auditorium of Seneca College, raised $20,000.

The children, in age groups of 8 to 10, 11 to 13, and 14 and up, vied for prizes in jazz, acrobatics, lyrical dance, tap and ballet.

As well, Watkin said, a special trophy for "the most cheerful presentation" went to the Joanne Chapman School of Dance from Mississauga.

Karen Kain, principal dancer of the National Ballet of Canada, presented the awards.

Schools have already called to ask to take part in next year's competition, he said, and he has received offers of financial and volunteer help.

The money Watkin is raising (he plans to make Dance for Orly an annual event) is slated to assist in a study by Dr. Andy Simor, head of Sunnybrook Hospital's department of microbiology, of penicillin-resistent bacteria.

A press release from the hospital explains that the streptococcus pneumoniae bacteria has become increasingly resistent to penicillin as well as other antiobiotic treatments.

"S. pneumoniae is the leading cause of infectious disease-related illness and death in Canada and the United States, and accounts for more than 3,000 cases of meningitis, over 500,000 cases of pneumonia and other serious illnesses," the release notes.

Simor's study will determine the level of resistance and subsequently alternative methods of treatment, and try to better understand how the bacteria is caused and spread.

As well, Simor, along with a research team at Mount Sinai Hospital, will study exactly how the body resists antibiotics.

Watkin said that although the project exhausted him, "I felt I had to do this for my daughter." His voice breaking, he told The CJN, "She was so special — and in one second she was gone."

Photographer dies at 45

TORONTO — Allan Anshan, whose photographs appeared often in the pages of The CJN, died suddenly of a heart attack on April 30. He was 45.

Born in Toronto in 1949, he attended William Lyon Mackenzie C. I. After leaving school at the age of 16, with the help of his sister, Esther Drukarsh, he began working at Graphic Artists, "as a gofer." He learned photography skills, and at the age of 40 struck out on his own, establishing Alron Photos on Queen Street W.

Besides news and general photography, he specialized in models' portfolios, Drukarsh said. He was proud of doing all his own technical work, she added.

Jeff Rosen, CJN news editor, praised Anshan's professionalism, cooperation and skill. "He had a good eye for what would make a good news photograph."

Besides Drukarsh, Anshan is survived by his wife JoAnne Warren and her children David and Andrea, mother Minnie Anshan, two nephews and a niece. — L.S.

Classes resume after strike

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A month-long strike by teachers at United Congregational Schools (UCS) has ended, and classes at the three campuses were to resume this past Sunday.

The 10 teachers accepted a contract that will stay in force until June 1996.

The school year for the roughly 300 students will be extended but it isn't known yet by how long. Efraim Bagola, president of the Federation of Teachers in Hebrew Schools, told The CJN.

The teachers walked off the job April 2 in a dispute that centred around job security, severance and sick leave. They had been without a contract for three years.

Bagola said the deal means teachers can only be fired for cause or because of diminished enrolment, both based on seniority.

He said the package has brought teachers' demands on severance in line with provincial guidelines and has won back accumulated sick leave credits.

The strike shut down afternoon and Sunday supplementary classes at Beth Emeth and Beth David synagogues and at Westminster Public School in Thornhill.

Bagola called the deal "a major victory" for teachers, with the sole concession coming on severance.

But UCS board chair Anita Bromberg was less enthusuastic, saying the deal is an "interim" one that solves only the sick leave issue and leaves everything else "on the table."

She said an agreement on severance was for the short term only and there has been no change regarding job security.

Bromberg also said the school year will likely be extended, possibly to June 30.

Revenge not in Holocaust survivor's vocabulary

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Emotions were close to the surface at a gala dinner that wound up a recent two-day community Holocaust remembrance and commemoration of the 50th anniversary of liberation.

Pride in the accomplishments of survivors and a determination to fight hatred were recurring themes in the evening's speeches. The event, which drew a crowd of 300 to Adath Israel Congregation, was entitled A Celebration of Life. It was co-sponsored by Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, and the Holocaust remembrance committee of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto.

In the keynote address, Lithuanian-born Brooklyn College professor Yaffa Eliach, 57, told of her heartwrenching childhood and her six-continent quest for documentation from her home town, Ejszyszki, a shtetl founded in 1073 by her ancestors.

As a child, Eliach, witnessed the murder of her mother and baby brother by local Poles, who invaded their home three months after liberation.

Yet revenge is not in her vocabulary, she emphasized. "Indeed it is our obligation to teach the world that never again will any victims any place be put in such a position," said an impassioned Eliach.

Other speakers included Eleanor Getzler, chair of the Holocaust remembrance committee; Gerda Frieberg, chair, Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, (the first survivor to hold that position); Sandra Brown of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto; Arlene Perly Rae, wife of Ontario premier Bob Rae; and Pnina Zilberman, director of the Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre of Toronto.

Tower of Faces

Toronto singer Theresa Tova performed a medley of Yiddish songs. Jenny Eisenstein also sang.

An excited Fanny Pillersdorf was reunited with Californians Samuel and Dora Baseman. The three survivors all lived at the DP camp in Leipheim, Germany just after the war.

A quilt by local artist Linda Goldman, commemorating the 50th anniversary of the end of World War II, was on display in the shul lobby for the occasion.

ORLY WATKIN

In loving memory of my beautiful beloved baby sister who died May 9, 1994 at the young age of 15.

It's been a year now that you have been gone and not a day goes by that you are not on my mind and in my thoughts.

Everywhere I go I am reminded of you and I see your beautiful and bright smile.

I find it so hard to believe and accept that you are not here. But I know that you are watching from above and see and hear all that goes on.

I know with all my heart that you know that I love and miss you with all that I am.

ORLY, You are "my light" that will shine eternally in my heart.

With all my love, missing you terribly, your sister

Tali

ORLY

I visited your room today
I did not find you there,
I touched your clothes
Your pillow, and
The brush that holds your hair.

I search in unmailed letters
Lying by your phone,
Your school work, your diary,
And I almost find you home.

I yearn to touch and hold you,
To hear you laugh
To see your smile,
I search and search,
Yet all the while,

I know that I will find you
When I look up to the sky,
The birds bring your message
As they are flying by,

You send them as a comfort
For the Mom who loves you so,
And as they wing away
I ask them not to go,

But you always send me others
I know just what you say,
"I am happy, do not worry,
I have not gone away"!

'Never let the story go'

By JOEL JACOBSON
CJN Maritimes Correspondent

HALIFAX — David Pollock was a 22-year-old Canadian radar officer on a mobile convoy to Berlin when an American officer invited him and his party to take a side trip to a concentration camp.

World War II was near its end on that April day in 1945 and Pollock, who had never heard of concentration camps, accepted the invitation.

"I grew up very quickly in a few hours," the Carleton University professor told a Yom Hashoah audience of 150 at Shaar Shalom Synagogue in Halifax. "I was a member of the only Jewish family in my small Saskatchewan home town and had never heard of anti-Semitism."

Pollock was one of thousands of liberators of those who remained alive among the Jews and others who had been incarcerated and slaughtered by the Nazis.

He spoke of the atrocities he saw during his brief visit to Buchenwald. "In one building, there were bodies everywhere. People were beyond hope and the stench was horrible. I lit cigarette after cigarette to kill the odor. I saw prisoners on beds, naked. Others wore concentration camp uniforms. They had no strength, no hair, no flesh."

He said he saw the torture room and the crematoria. "The furnaces were still too hot to touch." Pollock took photographs, which are now on display at the Holocaust Museum in Washington, D.C.

"Fifty years later, I see a duality between technology and hate," he said. "We have seen what technology and hate can do in Rwanda, Bosnia, and even Oklahoma City."

He urged people to be vigilant about hatred. The generation of prisoners, survivors, liberators and witnesses is disappearing, he said. "We must tell what happened and never let the story go."

The Holocaust Memorial Day program, organized by the Atlantic Jewish Council, featured a candle lighting in which six candles were lit by community members as names of 10 Jews murdered by the Nazis were read. Included in the lighting was Helena Rockel of Halifax, a survivor who escaped the final death march in 1945.

Atlantic Jewish Council

Members of the 1994 March of the Living spoke at the end of the ceremony and the Simon Wiesenthal Centre film, Liberation, was shown.

In Saint John, N.B., another community gathering heard Dr. Sandra Gereau, professor of European History at St. Thomas University in Fredericton, talk about other holocausts in the world today.

Ed Caissie of Minto Elementary and Junior High School displayed a scale model of a refugee camp at Ripples, N.B., used in post-war times to hold Jewish refugees and people who did not agree with Canadian government positions.

Part of the program honored New Brunswick high school students who completed essays on The Holocaust and its Role in the World Democracy. They were presented with prizes from the Joel Athletic and Educational Foundation of Toronto, named after the late son of Marshal (Jacobson) Swirsky, a former Saint John resident.

Interfaith service held in Windsor

WINDSOR — Over 500 people, including many non-Jews, turned out late last month for an interfaith Yom Hashoah service at Congregation Shaar Hashomayim here.

Representatives from the Sandwich Baptist Church, the Windsor Catholic School Board, the city's race and ethnocultural relations committee and the United Church joined the Jewish community for the public service.

Keynote speaker was Alan Brown, a retired economics professor at the University of Windsor and a Holocaust survivor. Brown recounted his wartime experiences, first in the Hungarian town of Miskolc and then in a labor camp in Austria, where a non-Jew, Rosa Schreiber, saved him and his father by sneaking them food and medicine.

Brown said that, in the face of modern-day genocides in Rwanda, Cambodia and Bosnia, present and future generations must do all they can to combat prejudice and intolerance.

The K'El Maleh Rachamim was chanted by Cantor David Neumark and Kaddish was recited by Rabbi Yosil Rosenzweig.

The first of seven memorial candles was lit by Jacob Rosenzweig, the oldest of Windsor's 66 Holocaust survivors.

The service was dedicated to the 12 survivors who died in the past year.

Hamilton honors Legion veterans

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — A crowd of 500 filled Beth Jacob Synagogue on Yom Hashoah for the annual community-wide commemoration program, which this year marked the 50th anniversary of the liberation.

As people of all ages placed yahrzeit candles on the bimah, names of those who perished, relatives of local survivors, were read.

The audience applauded as representatives of the local Dutch Canadian community were presented with a plaque "in recognition and gratitude for the many instances when Dutch men, women and children risked their lives to protect their Jewish fellow citizens."

The crowd rose in tribute as 12 members of the Maccabees Branch 343, Royal Canadian Legion, placed Canadian, Israeli and regimental flags on the bimah.

The veterans remained on the bimah as Dr. Alex Rosa, a survivor from Czechoslovakia, introduced the candlelighting ceremony and Cantor David Bercovici of Beth Jacob chanted the K'El Maleh Rachamim and led the Kaddish.

Candles in memory of the six million were lit by survivors Frank Junger, Mauthausen; Cilka Silber, Auschwitz; Maurice Kaufman, Buchenwald; Ora Markstein, Bergen-Belsen; Ollie Horodetsky, Theresienstadt; and Margaret Rethazy, Ebensee.

The candle in memory of fallen Israeli soldiers was lit by Zion Naftoli.

Livia Kocsis and her two daughters, Alexandra and Jessica, and nieces Dana, Galia and Yona Randor, read excerpts from Elie Wiesel's The Six Days of Destruction, and soprano Ilana Karan performed Inge Auerbacher's I Will Survive.

The keynote speaker was American educator and Jewish community leader, Jeanette Eichenwald. Her message was one of hope and Jewish survival.

All her parents had when they came to the New World, said Eichenwald, was "their undying love for one another, their undying belief in G-d and their undying faith in the goodness of our heritage and our tradition."

And yet, her father, now 87, "has shown me by the way he chooses to live his own life," Eichenwald stated, "that this is not a world of nightmares but of dreams of a better world of righteousness, of justice and of mercy."

Hamilton Holocaust committee chair Gary Frydman opened the program; Ward I Alderman Marvin Caplan represented Mayor Bob Morrow, and the federation president David Steinberg made the presentation to the Dutch Canadian community.

Winnipeg program celebrates survival

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Despite our heavy losses, world Jewry has much to celebrate on the 50th anniversary of VE-Day and the end of the Holocaust, said Barbara Goszer, chair of the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council's Holocaust awareness committee.

"Our survival and regeneration signal our victory over Hitler and the Nazis and their genocidal plans," Goszer said at the traditional memorial service that marked the beginning of the annual Holocaust Awareness Week.

The service is held every year at the Bnay Abraham Synagogue in north Winnipeg, which has its own memorial to the Holocaust.

The evening began with the traditional change of name of the street in front of the synagogue to Avenue of the Warsaw Ghetto Heroes. Following Goszer's introduction, the mainly Jewish General Monash branch of the Royal Canadian Legion presented its colors. Choirs from the north end Talmud Torah/I. L. Peretz School and south Winnipeg Ramah School sang the traditional Ani Ma'amin and The Song of the Partisans.

This year, the committee chose to honor the senior members of its speakers' bureau and their children and grandchildren, by inviting them to light the six candles.

Following a speech in Yiddish by a representative of Winnipeg's Second Generation Group, Rabbi Neal Rose spoke of the need to decide how to remember the Holocaust in future and what we want to pass on.

"While in Boston for Pesach, we met a child survivor," Rabbi Rose said. "He is 51. A sobering thought struck me. Fifty years from now, how is the story going to be told? There are few events in the 20th century as well researched and documented as the Holocaust. But how is the next generation going to be able to tell the story?"

Rabbi Rose noted that Jews have the power of memory, referring to the Pesach story as the prime example. "Remembering for Jews is not simply a matter of storing information," he said. "It is a passing on of values. The art of Jewish storytelling in the true form puts forth the value of kiddush chaim (the sanctification of life)."

Other events during the week included a service on the grounds of Manitoba's Legislative Building in front of the Holocaust Monument.

Yom Hashoah

Rabbi Weiss thanks survivors for their courage to continue

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The haunting lilt of the Yiddish folksong Oifn Pripechik, sung softly by featured speaker Rabbi Avi Weiss, and picked up by a sombre, until then silent audience, was the emotional highlight of last week's Yom Hashoah program sponsored by the Canadian Holocaust Remembrance Association.

Over 400 people attended the program, which was held at Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue.

Rabbi Weiss, national president of AMCHA, the coalition for Jewish Concerns in New York, and known for his activist stances on Jewish issues, in what was for him a low-key but emotional speech, conjured up "images — so many images," of "a little boy, eyes full of fear," of "a woman about to be shot covering her breasts so at least she died in modesty," of "a patriarch, half his beard shaved off, as SS guards snicker."

Each of the generations, he said, the first (the survivors), the second (the children of survivors) and the third and beyond, have their own roles to play.

He thanked the survivors "with deep humility" for their "strength in bearing witness," and especially for having the courage to have children.

"Having children after Auschwitz is the greatest statement of belief, the greatest mitzvah.

"You are all kadosh — you are all holy."

The second generation, he said, has a special challenge to remember Allied politicians who refused to bomb train lines to the camps, and refused to trade trucks for Jews, "because Jews were worth so little."

"They allowed political expediency to outweigh morality," he charged.

The third generation, he said, "my children, your children, those who will be the first generation when the survivors have gone," have the greatest challenge — to remember.

Six memorial candles, set on tall black velvet-covered stands were lit by survivors Arnold Friedman, Stan Hochman, Ernst and Helene Breuer, Sol Goldrich, Clara Reitman and Henry Zagdanski and their families, young children skipping down the steps a potent reminder that there was, indeed, survival after Hitler.

As Shaarei Shomayim cantor Shlomo Sufrin intoned K'El Maleh Rachamim and Ani Ma'amin and Shaarei Shomayim spiritual leader Rabbi Mark Dratch recited Kaddish, the audience wiped tears from their eyes, or, more often, stared stoically into space.

Arnold Friedman, president of the Canadian Holocaust Remembrance Association, lamented that "anti-Semitism, genocide, and ethnic cleansing are on the rise, while academics worry about overpopulation," and in Canada "Nazis walk free."

Our mission should be to use the lessons of history as guidelines to the future, to ensure that such a tragedy never happens again, and to ferret out and prosecute Nazis, he said.

Staci Hochman read a poem written by her grandfather Stan Hochman when he was in a concentration camp.

Dror Zeigerman, consul general of Israel, brought greetings from the State of Israel.

Pride of Israel Congregation held their own Yom Hashoah program. Rabbi Aaron Flanzraich told The CJN that "the most effective Yom Hashoah programs are the ones that are the simplest."

Over 200 people heard about what it was like to be liberated from the camps from Joseph Steinmetz, Mike Englishman and Jerry Siegel.

Greetings were brought by Israeli vice-consul Haim Waxman and by M.P. Art Eggleton.

A play based on Carol Matas' young adult book Lisa, about a teenager in the Danish resistance was put on the night before.

"We wanted it [the shul's Holocaust remembrance program] to be a celebration of a positive event [the liberation], not just a memorial to a tragedy," Rabbi Flanzreich said.

Seeds of evil alive, says Rose

Allied governments and the American government had resisted Hitler right at the beginning, who knows what the course of history would have been? When freedom perished in Germany, so did the Jews."

Regretfully today, he said, the Holocaust denial movement is hard at work, war criminals living in Canada have gone unpunished and Jews have been killed in places like Israel and Argentina, just because they are Jews.

"It tells me that the seeds of evil are unfortunately very much alive."

Rose also called on Jews to remember the Gypsies, "who were destroyed with us," the soldiers who fell battling the Nazis and the Jewish resistance fighters who stared down the Germans in places like the Warsaw Ghetto.

We should remember too the exceptional courage of the righteous gentiles who took the risk of hiding Jewish children and families.

Finally, Rose concluded, the lesson of Bergen-Belsen is to remember the victims.

"In November 1945, I went back to Belsen and people were still dying, but they all had a recurrent theme — remember us, remember us. And I think we have a duty to remember their days until the end of ours," he said.

Since Yom Hashoah ceremonies everywhere this year [illegible]

liberation of the concentration camps, the Ottawa Shoah committee concluded its commemoration by awarding plaques to diplomatic or military representatives of the liberation armies. Minister of Defence David Collenette accepted the plaque for Canada. France, Britain, the United States and Russia were also honored.

Jewish Scouts remember Israel's fallen soldiers

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — As the Israel flag was lowered to half-mast by Segev Mueisa and Yaniv Shimla of the Zabar Scouts and Taps was played by Alex Sorin, some 1,500 people stood in silence at a Yom Hazikaron assembly to memorialize Israel's fallen soldiers.

More than 40 Zabar Scouts — Israeli Boy and Girl Scouts Federation of Toronto — participated in the program at the Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue, sponsored by the consulate general of Israel in Toronto.

Those who gave their lives for the State of Israel were remembered with music, poetry, speeches and prayers, in English, Hebrew and Yiddish.

Cantor Yehuda Rotner chanted K'El Maleh Rachamim, and Shimon Inbar recited Kaddish. Yizkor was read in Hebrew by Major (Res.) Isaac Gelber and in English by Lt. (Res.) Oren Lapsker.

The Ne'imot Singers, a choir of Israelis and Canadians, were accompanied by pianist Doron Ophir. Israel David, the choir's soloist, sang Ha'reut (Friendship) composed by Chaim Guri, and guitarist

'Tears of sadness turn to tears of joy'

Daphna Tzur performed Achi Ha'tzair Yehuda (My Younger Brother Yehuda), by Ehud Manor.

Shimon Zer Aviv, who coordinated the assembly with Frances-ca David, was the MC. He recited David's Lament (Samuel 11:1).

Speaking in Hebrew and English, Dror Zeigerman, the Israeli consul general spoke of "the fallen soldiers of the Independence War, Sinai War, the War of Attrition, the Six Day War, the Yom Kippur War, Peace of Galilee and the War against terror. Today, here in Toronto, we salute these people, their families and the continuation of a strong and independent Israel.

"Two days ago, we commemorated Yom Hashoah, today we commemorate Yom Hazikaron, and tomorrow we will celebrate Yom Ha'atzmaut — tears of sadness turn to tears of joy."

He concluded with the prayer that, "Never again will we have to bury our war heroes."

The secret of our survival, said Rabbi Philip Scheim, spiritual leader of Beth David, has been the sound of the voices of Jewish children learning and playing in Israel. These are our greatest national resource.

Rabbi Scheim praised the "precious thousands of Israeli soldiers, men and women," who gave their last breath for the sake of Israeli children, for the sake of the Jewish future.

Nitsan Wienberg, who along with Revital Ben-Knai is a leader of the Zabar Scouts, told The CJN, "Israelis want to keep their ties and heritage to Israel."

Vancouver community honors Frankenburgs

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — More than 400 members of the Vancouver Jewish community paid tribute to Dennis and Naomi Frankenburg, at the annual Negev dinner held recently at the Hyatt Regency Hotel.

"They immigrated to Vancouver 35 years ago from England knowing nobody, and in that time they have enriched our lives," said dinner chair Fances Belzberg.

Ruth Freeman, president of the Pacific region of the Jewish National Fund (JNF), which sponsored the dinner, also praised the Frankenburgs.

She said Dennis, a former British army paratrooper, used his accounting experience to serve as treasurer for a number of Vancouver organizations.

Naomi has been closely associated with Jewish education, Canadian Jewish Congress and JNF, and was the first Vancouverite to become president of Canadian Hadassah-WIZO.

Naomi marvelled at Israel's growth from a population of 650,000 in 1948 to 5.5 million.

"We are a privileged generation, she said, "because we are the generation that has seen Israel's rebirth and growth to a flourishing state."

Since 1901, when JNF was founded, it has planted 200 million trees — "some in the most inhospitable places." Israel is the only country in the world where the desert is getting smaller, she said.

Sid Halpern of Winnipeg, national president, said JNF's water conservation policy will help the peace process.

Halpern also paid tribute to Ben and Esther Dayson of Vancouver for restoring as a museum the Jewish National Fund House in Tel Aviv, where Israel was proclaimed an independent state.

The keynote speaker, Maj.-Gen. Lewis MacKenzie, is the Canadian who served as chief of staff and commander of land forces of the UN peacekeeping force in the former Yugoslavia. He was also in the very first UN peacekeeping force, serving in the Gaza Strip and helping negotiate the ceasefire in the Yom Kippur War.

"I wish I could be more optimistic about the situation in the Middle East right now," MacKenzie said. But "a lot of whackos are running around disrupting the peace process."

Ruth Freeman

He claimed people who are making money out of the conflict in Gaza, the West Bank and Lebanon "are keeping it going as the result of acts of terrorist atrocities. It's not ideology, it's self-interest," he said.

Mel Kotler, of Kelowna, was honored with the Bernard M. Bloomfield Medal, presented annually to "deserving JNF workers" in various areas across Canada, on an alternating basis.

The Esther and Eric Exton Educational Award, conceived in 1982 to mark JNF's 80th anniversary, went to Eleanor Braude, principal of the Richmond, B.C. Jewish Day School.

Gideon Shavit, the JNF shaliach from Israel, announced that JNF established 52 projects last year, many supported by British Columbia residents. Shavit, who returns to Israel this summer after three years here, was praised for his work in expanding the organization's activities.

General public invited to UJA campaign opening

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For the first time, the general public is being invited to the opening of the United Jewish Appeal (UJA) campaign, set for Sept. 6 at the Ford Centre for the Performing Arts in North York.

Other innovations this year are a shorter campaign and a definite ending date of Nov. 23.

But one thing co-chairs Carol Kassel and Chuck Gold are counting on is the same high rate of enthusiasm the 2,000-plus volunteers show in their canvassing. In fact, recruiting for volunteers is already underway, with an education program for them planned for August.

Kassel and Gold are plunging into the campaign with their own motivation flag high. "The Toronto Jewish community is the envy of the world and that's why so many new people are coming here," said Gold.

Chuck Gold

Carol Kassel

"This year we're concentrating on primacy needs," said Kassel, a former chair of the women's campaign. "We want the canvassers and the donors to talk to each other, to talk about why and where the money is needed."

This year 51.4 per cent of the proceeds will go to local needs of the community and 48.6 per cent to Israel, most of the latter to meet the rescue, resettlement and absorption costs incurred by the dramatic rescues of Jews from Syria, Sarajevo, Chechnya and other countries. Israel is still absorbing 5,000 to 6,000 Soviet Jews every month, Kassel said.

The co-chairs are understandably elated over the latest census figures, which show that the Toronto Jewish community has grown to 162,000, and they consider it a tribute to the city's strong resources.

But they're wasting no time in inviting the newcomers to become part of the UJA team. For example, the South African community is having its own UJA opener May 16, with a speech by Mendel Caplan, Jewish Agency chair. Potential donors in the South African community have increased from 300 to 1,100.

A special effort is to be made to canvass the Israeli community, which now numbers about 25,000.

As last year, links with the synagogues have been strengthened and rabbis are represented on the management team and on all cabinet committees. Another strong effort is also planned for every university and college campus.

Reflecting the focus of the community's interest in the past year or two, co-chairs Kassel and Gold say the UJA campaign will stress the message of Jewish education and continuity.

Both Kasssel and Gold have risen to the top campaign posts through hard work in the ranks. Kassel, a marketing consultant in private life, gets strong support from her husband, Bill, and two children, Adam, 22, a student at McGill University and Dana, 20, a Queen's undergraduate.

Gold, who practised obstetrics and gynecology for 20 years before turning to real estate and land development five years ago, and his wife, Marilyn, have two sons, Jamie and Paul, a daughter and son-in-law, Barbara and Charles Taerk, another daughter, Jackie, and two grandchildren, Joshua and Zachary Taerk.

Future of modern Orthodoxy discussed

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The religious world is moving towards a blurring of some of the boundaries separating central Orthodoxy from Conservative Judaism on the one hand and the haredi on the other, Rabbi Yitzchak Witty told an audience of over 200 at this year's Meyer Gasner Memorial lecture.

This will not necessarily mean an actual merger between the groups, but will arise as a result of influences from the outside world, he explained.

Rabbi Witty, executive director of the Board of Jewish Education, along with Prof. Leo Davids, associate professor of sociology at York University, and Rabbi Shlomo Jakobovits, general studies principal of Eitz Chaim Schools, was discussing the future of modern Orthodoxy.

The move to the left by the Conservative movement, seen in such changes as the ordination of women as rabbis, will lead to the merging of modern Orthodoxy with the more traditional Conservative Jews, such as those in the Union of Traditional Judaism, Rabbi Witty said.

At the other end of the spectrum, he said, the haredi "can't keep living in the world without some movement into it."

That is already happening, he said, in such fields as medical care. And one may be extremely particular, for example, about the details of what constitutes a halachically perfect etrog, he noted, but "the etrog comes here on a jet."

The speakers agreed with moderator Rabbi Mark Dratch, spiritual leader of Shaarei Shomayim where the program was held, that modern Orthodoxy ("some call it centrist, dati, or Yeshiva University orthodoxy," noted Rabbi Dratch wryly) operates on the basic principal of the authority of Torah and Halachah, and a total commitment to the observance of Jewish law.

At the same time, its adherents see value in secular education and the wish to be a part of contemporary civilization; in religious zionism, which not only sees Israel as a holy land, but the very existence of the State of Israel as having religious value — raishit tzmichat ge'ulateinu (the first flowering of our redemption); and in an openness to the non-Orthodox.

The first flowering of our redemption

Davids, who has done extensive research into the family, said that while those living an Orthodox lifestyle are fairly immune to such problems of the larger community as child pregnancy, youth gangs, violence, drug addiction, and "the massive ignorance of Torah and Jewish tradition common in the [general] Jewish population," their problems do include workaholism ("that used to afflict only husbands — now it's unisex") and marriage breakdown, with such related single-parenting problems as poverty, stress and "scarred children."

"These problems are not somewhere else," he said, urging the Orthodox to work with other Jews. "To protect our future as part of the Jewish people, we must be ready to face the impact of modern life, the challenges and dangers of our environment."

Rabbi Jakobovits said the State of Israel, not, as some say, the Holocaust or a worldwide trend towards fundamentalism, is responsible for the return to observance by many Jews, especially the young.

"The Holocaust turned off as many [as had their faith strengthened by it], and Islamic fundamentalism particularly is more concerned with governmental issues. And Christian fundamentalism does not show this trend at all."

In Israel, he said, many sections of the Shulchan Aruch are part of the law of the land, "which has had an enormous impact on increasing respect for Halachah."

Also, he said, the very existence of a state "gave an uplift of self-esteem the like of which we didn't have during the golah [dispersal]."

With the passage of time, he said, the Holocaust will recede as an influence on Jewish life, but "Israel won't — it is here to stay."

The Meyer Gasner Memorial Lecture (this year called a forum) is sponsored by Mizrachi of Canada, Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, and Shaarei Shomayim.

Greetings were brought by Susan Jackson, director of community and educational services of CJC Ontario region. The panel was thanked by Kurt Rothschild, national president of Mizrachi.

Anti-racism program coordinator honored

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Canadian Jewish Congress Pacific region presented the Morris Saltzman Award to Sam Fillipoff, for his "outstanding contribution to community relations in British Columbia."

Fillipoff, who is coordinator of the British Columbia Teachers Federation (BCTF) anti-racism program, has worked closely with Marilyn Berger, associate director of Congress, in developing anti-facist educational programs in schools throughout British Columbia.

Fillipoff, formerly race relations consultant for the Vancouver school board, is the liaison for the BCTF and the provincial, federal and municipal departments and organizations which operate multicultural and anti-racist activities.

He has organized multicultural, anti-racist camps for students and teachers throughout the province and facilitated the presentation of Holocaust education symposiums in collaboration with Congress, in a number of school districts.

Series of outreach programs

Currently, with a $12,000 grant from the provincial government, Congress, assisted by Fillipoff, is conducting a series of outreach programs in five school districts.

The first was held in Saltspring Island at the Gulf Islands Secondary School in March, with speakers including William Nicholas, professor emeritus of religion at the University of British Columbia; Bronia Sonnenschein, an Auschwitz survivor; and Rabbi Itchak Marmorstein, of Saltspring, a child of survivors.

It was followed in April by one in Victoria at Victoria High School. Another program is scheduled for May 24 at the Matthew McNair Secondary School in suburban Richmond.

Berger told The CJN each program is "tailor made" for the area in which it's held. Additional speakers and panelists join the discussions "to bring the perspective from the ethnic community as it reflects on local issues of concern."

Berger, who is a pioneer in organizing Holocaust programs at the University of British Columbia, paid tribute to Fillipoff for helping expand the programs to the various school districts.

Berger said she is hopeful the outreach programs will become a permanent commitment of the B.C. government.

Tel Aviv Foundation returns to Canada

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For the first time in five years, the Tel Aviv Foundation is working to re-establish an official presence in Canada.

The organization, established in Israel in 1978, has funded some 300 major projects in Tel Aviv-Jaffa, the country's largest metropolis. Underprivileged children and seniors have been among those to benefit from the building of educational, recreational, social and cultural facilities.

The Canadian committee for the Tel Aviv Foundation got off the ground in 1988 in Toronto, but dissolved about two years later when its driving force, former Israeli consul general Gideon Saguy, retired from the committee.

Etty Lothan

Meet with supporters

Etty Lothan, newly appointed projects coordinator for the Tel Aviv Foundation, was in Toronto and Montreal recently to meet with supporters and potential supporters. She plans to return in June, when she will also visit Vancouver.

Lothan is a native Tel Avivian and former English teacher with a background in real estate. She was hired after Tel Aviv mayor Roni Milo decided to open a Canadian desk for the foundation following his election in November.

Milo's predecessor, Shlomo ("Cheech") Lahat, was instrumental in founding the organization, which has support in Los Angeles, New York, Germany, England and South America.

"Our aim is looking at the future," said Lothan in a Toronto interview. Two Jaffa kindergartens typify that aim. One is a special education program that prepares children for regular classes after three years of intensive work.

The other is Gan Shalom, a kindergarten for Arab and Jewish children donated by the municipality of Cologne, Germany. "That's coexistence," said Lothan.

In Tel Aviv's Hatikvah neighborhood, once known for its high crime rate, 30 youngsters age five to eight come to a "day boarding home" every day after school and stay until about 8 p.m. There they are "washed, fed, helped with their homework and [they can] talk to an adviser or social worker."

Parents also receive assistance with things like job hunting, getting legal advice regarding a divorce and even, in some cases, learning to read and write.

The facility could accommodate twice the number of children if it were renovated, Lothan noted.

The home's atmosphere is positive, like its name, Bustanit (which derives from the Hebrew word for orchard), Lothan said.

"That's our future. [We're giving those children] the same chance I would give my own kids."

Mephisto: the ultimate walking shoe is a low-risk, high-return investment

In an age of high-risk, low-return investments, many investors are turning to an increasingly popular alternative which yields optimum returns for an outlay of some $250 – $300.

So form-fitting and comfortable are these French hand-made shoes that their proponents (many of them world-famous celebrities) insist on wearing them everywhere, even to board meetings. Like a "little rascal", this lovable shoe keeps turning up everywhere it shouldn't. And walking miles and miles.

Most shoe manufacturers design their shoes in isolation of the foot. Mephisto, on the other hand, has analyzed the physiological needs of the human foot and developed a range of shoes, boots and sandals to meet those needs. Each pair of all-natural, all-resoleable shoes is handled by 98 different artisans.

Mephistos cost more. Or do they? When you consider that they will last you several times longer than other brands, the long-range cost is much smaller.

And what price health? We say that if we don't have our health, we don't have anything — but do we really practise what we preach? How often do we take a quiet walk before making a big decision? Do we really smell the roses, or think about doing it — someday?

Mephistos are designed with a myriad of features that can correct or alleviate almost any back problem or foot-related disorder. For walking, for golfing, for hiking, Mephistos will redefine your idea of comfort.

Mephistos are worn by celebrities, but they don't need celebrity endorsements; their market penetration has been so rapid, so "underground" in nature, that they have acquired a cult following of sorts.

Now! Health insurance for your appliances. Why take chances?

For ten years, Southern Atlantic Appliance Service has been providing a unique form of insurance to both home and condominium owners in Ontario. Robert and Errol Gordon founded the company in April of 1984, basing their idea on one which had been very successful in Florida for many years: a single insurance package for all makes and models of appliances. Until the father and son opened their business, no company in Toronto was offering such a package.

The Southern Atlantic Service Protection Plan works like other kinds of Insurance. You avoid major repair bills and assure yourself of fast, dependable service by factory-trained technicians at no additional cost to you. For as little as $99.00 a year for five major appliances, or pennies a day you can protect yourself against the high cost of repairs.

The Southern Atlantic Protection Plan covers all parts and labour required for maintaining the insured appliances in good operating condition. There is no limit to the number of repairs; and there are no charges for trips or pick-ups. You are guaranteed service within 24 hours of your call. Often, however, a technician will visit you on the same day.

Southern Atlantic technicians service any brand or model of appliance, so that no matter what makes you own, the one call to Southern is the only one you need to make. Southern Atlantic has also been authorized by Sub Zero, Thermador and other manufacturers to do warranty service. The company's technicians regularly attend schooling seminars in order to keep up with new technology in the appliance industry, and maintain their skills and efficiency at a high level. For non-members, Southern will make C.O.D. calls.

During the last few years, Southern Atlantic has expanded it's business to meet the needs of both their clients and the public by carrying a full line of top quality water filters for those concerned with maintaining the purity of their drinking water.

Southern Atlantic Appliance Service is a 100% Canadian-owned company, and member of the Better Business Bureau. In order to apply for your "Easy Peace of Mind" Protection Plan, don't hesitate to call: (905) 738-4076.

Mattress Showcase

Mattress Showcase is the brainchild of the same person who in 1954 had the wisdom and foresight to bring Sealy to Canada. He and his associates have a combined 100 years experience in the mattress industry.

Mattress Showcase is the first of its kind in Canada. Our company goal is quite simple; to supply our customers with the bed that fits their needs.

Buying a mattress can be quite confusing. We want to make purchasing a mattress simple and straightforward. We have the largest selection of quality beds in Canada and a staff ready to make sure your selection is the right choice.

We offer the consumer the best products at the lowest possible prices. We provide service, information, advice, and also to the purchaser, the opportunity of becoming part of network marketing – which has escalated to a global business of staggering proportions. Selling through network marketing doesn't require a massive investment in advertising and promotion, because sales and promotion are carried on by word of mouth.

Mattress Showcase chooses its Manufacturing Partners very carefully. One of the most important considerations for becoming a Manufacturing Partner of Mattress Showcase is the dedication and ability to produce the highest quality merchandise possible. We carry famous brand names such as Simmons Beautyrest, Simmons Beautysleep, Spring Air, Marshall and Serta.

All of the products that can be purchased from Mattress Showcase are backed by a warranty from the manufacturer.

Mattress Showcase is so dedicated to customer satisfaction that we will replace or exchange any product, if they are not completely satisfied... for any reason!

This policy is in effect for up to 30 days after purchase of any product from Mattress Showcase.

Our market research shows that although the consumer wants the best bed for their needs, not one retailer offers only the best bedding. We have the largest selection of top quality beds in all of Canada.

Our product is promoted mainly by word of mouth. Our costs are kept to a minimum and our savings are passed on to the consumer. Therefore, the opportunity exists to purchase the right bed at a tremendous savings.

Too many retail bedding salespeople are not knowledgeable in how to offer a good night's sleep. Mattress Showcase features an intensive employee education program, designed to provide a potential salesperson with the proper training to assist the consumer with their purchase.

Shop the rest, then come to the best.

Cosmetic Surgery– A change for the better

In this youth and fitness oriented society, with an increased awareness about positive self image, people want more control over their bodies.

Aesthetic Plastic Surgery is designed primarily to improve appearance, thereby enhancing self esteem. The increased interest in youth, beauty, and health has been a major influencing factor.

Cosmetic surgery is no longer a privilege reserved for the wealthy. Men and women, young and old, people from all walks of life are wanting to make a change for the better.

The Centre for Cosmetic Surgery is a self-contained surgical facility in mid-town Toronto where the latest in medical technology has been incorporated in a private and elegant setting.

The unique facility is a free standing, comprehensive centre for the exclusive practice of aesthetic plastic surgery.

The comprehensive consultation with Dr. Michael Bederman, the principal surgeon, is informative and by far the best way to find out what cosmetic procedure is appropriate for you. The advancement and improvement of surgical techniques has made the various procedures safer, with minimal pain and shorter recovery time.

Dr. Bederman has had an active practice in Toronto since 1975. He received his degree in Medicine at U. of T. in 1969 and trained in Plastic Surgery in Montreal, Miami and New York and received his Specialist Certificate in Plastic Surgery in Toronto in 1974.

Dr. Bederman is often consulted and quoted in print and television media and is a frequent lecturer and speaker.

A member of the Canadian Royal College of Physicians and Surgeons, Dr. Bederman holds membership in many other Canadian, American and International Societies. He also continues to practice Plastic and Reconstructive surgery at the Scarborough General Hospital.

The Centre for Cosmetic Surgery also operates as a resource information facility which provides video tapes and printed materials on all the latest procedures. We offer a relaxed, elegant atmosphere for post-operative recovery. Private nurses are available for overnight patient stay at the Centre. Nurses are registered with the College of Nurses of Ontario.

From your initial consultation to your final post-op. visit, our staff will attentively guide you every step of the way.

They bring their knowledge, enthusiasm and sincerity to our patients. Always happy to take the time to answer any related questions or concerns.

Enhancing the Dignity of Woman

ILANIT'S STORY

"Dan beat me for 18 years! I was afraid all the time. I took my nervous tension out on my children until they became rude and nasty to me like their father. Then one day, I phoned the number that Na'amat publicizes to let people like me know where to go for help. Its been two years since Dan and I began going to a Na'amat Counselling Centre for the Prevention of Domestic Violence. I can't believe how he has changed! I learned to stand up for myself and Dan learned to understand what he'd been doing to us. Even our children have changed. I don't know where we'd be without Na'amat's help."

Na'amat's five centres for the Prevention of Domestic Violence have aided over 5,000 women victims. The centres' criminologists and social workers deal with the authorities, such as police and hospitals, whenever necessary. They provide counselling, run support groups for battered wives and rehabilitation services for battering husbands. Na'amat tries to break the cycle of violence and change patterns of behaviour where possible. When it is not possible, they help find alternative solutions. In a large percentage of cases, Na'amat's efforts to rehabilitate these dysfunctional families have been outstandingly successful.

Typical costs to Na'amat to provide services:

$400. provides one week of de-victimization group therapy for an abused woman.
$300. provides individual support counselling for a victim for the first week.

If you wish to help enhance the dignity of women and advance their role in society through the Hand In Hand program please send your gift to Na'amat "Hand In Hand", 272 Codsell Avenue, Downsview, Ont. M3H 3X2 or call (416) 636-5425

Jewish Contemporary Singles... A new beginning!

In honour of our 10th Anniversary, we are pleased to announce that Jewish Contemporary Singles is having a NEW BEGINNING!

Phyllis Kaye, known in the Jewish Community as the "maven" of match-making is stepping down to pursue other exciting business opportunities. However, she will provide everything necessary to ensure a successful transition for the current members of Jewish Contemporary Singles.

The reigns are being passed to JENNIFER SHARPE, a well-known and popular Wedding Consultant in the Toronto area. Jennifer has a degree from U of T in Sociology with special emphasis on interpersonal relations. Her six years as a Wedding Consultant has allowed her to meet many men and women in the community. These contacts will certainly enhance J.C.S. client base.

Jennifer is redirecting the company and returning to a personal approach, dealing with members individually. Jennifer will consult with each member to get detailed information about who they are and what they are hoping for in a mate. Jewish Contemporary Singles believes in a much more in-depth selection process than simply looking through a book for pictures and profiles. We want to match people whom we feel have enough in common to really enjoy each other. The member, however, will definitely have input and control over the selection process!

While working across the full age spectrum, we have a special interest in matching separated and divorced men and women - a group with particular dating needs. This service is a great way to meet people who share similar experiences, face similar challenges and, therefore, can more easily relate to one another.

As always, fees continue to be reasonable. You can be on your way to meeting that special someone, hand-picked just for you. Let our NEW BEGINNING be a NEW BEGINNING for you. This service remains STRICTLY CONFIDENTIAL! Call today! (416) 484-9733.

V.E. Day Memories

Victory parade in Colombo, May 1945.

War not over but celebrated in Asia

By NAT KAUFMAN

I recall vividly that Landmark Day, VE-Day, May 7, 1945. With mixed emotions, I watched the VE-Day parade in Colombo, Ceylon, as it was known at the time.

Our crew happened to be on leave and were staying at the beautiful Gall Face Hotel, enabling us to relax for a few days before returning to our Squadron at KKS, a jungle base on the north-eastern part of the island. We were part of the RCAF attached to the RAF 160 Squadron.

We were assigned to mine enemy harbors and attack and sink the Japanese ships that were supplying their troops in Burma, Singapore and Sumatra region of Southeastern Asia.

We flew American-made Liberator aircraft. Our trips were long — 16-21½ hours. I was a navigator- bombardier, with the rank of flying officer at the time.

The war for us was not over on May 7, 1945. We still had to engage a most formidable and dangerous foe, the Japanese. It was nearly six months before I returned home to Toronto. After four years of service and over 1,000 operational hours.

I was one of the lucky ones, I arrived home in relatively good health, unlike many of my buddies for whom the Indian Ocean was their final resting place.

Canadian celebrated VE-Day in Tel Aviv

By SAUL BINDMAN

I was a member of the RCAF stationed in the Middle East and spending some time at a Canadian forces rest centre in Tel Aviv on VE-Day.

Rumors of the capitulation of the Nazi armies had been circulating for several days when suddenly the loud speakers situated throughout the city started blaring out the news — "It's all over. VE-Day has arrived!"

Immense excitement started to build; most merchants closed their shops and people literally poured out of their homes. I suddenly found myself linked arm and arm with hundreds of residents, dancing and singing for several hours.

Tears of joy flowed freely, combined with untold sadness in memory of many family members and friends who perished during the Nazi madness in Europe.

As the celebration quieted down, I went to the beach where I was greeted with the most beautiful sight ever: groups of children with day-care counsellors holding hands and wading in and out of the sea in a long line.

I feel very grateful and fortunate to relate this wonderful experience but I have given a great deal of thought to the fate of those little Sabras during past 50 years. They were the vanguard and the heart and soul of the building and defending the wonderful State of Israel.

Teen's birthday present: VE-Day

By RUTH SHEFTMAN DERMER

May 7, 1945, my 17th birthday, was a lovely spring day.

I was sitting in my math class at Strathcona Academy High School. It was my graduation year.

All week long there were rumors enemy and victory was imminent.

At approximately 10:30 a.m., trucks and jeeps, with honking horns, began roaring down Cote St. Catherine Road. Soldiers were screaming, "It's over, the war is over, we won the war!!" What a moment in time!

As we stood at the window dismissed the students to allow us to go downtown and join the festivities. Celebrate we did, with tears and laughter, a day not to be forgotten.

On May 13, 1995, the class of '45 from Strathcona Academy is holding a 50th reunion. We hope to come together to joyously remember "the good 'ole days" and the end of World War II.

Land confiscation clouds talks with Palestinians

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service and Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Arab furor over Israel's plans to confiscate lands in eastern Jerusalem has clouded the Jewish state's already troubled negotiations with the Palestinians.

But Israeli Foreign Minister Shimon Peres is still optimistic the two sides will meet a July 1 deadline for reaching agreement on Palestinian elections and a concurrent Israeli army withdrawal from Arab population centres in the West Bank.

Peres encountered Arab anger over the Israeli move firsthand last Sunday, when he travelled to Cairo for meetings with Egyptian officials and Palestinian negotiators.

He arrived a day after foreign ministers from the 22-member League of Arab States met in Cairo, where they called on the United Nations' Security Council to block the Israeli move.

But Israel rejected the call for a UN meeting, saying the land had to be confiscated from Jews as well as Arabs in order to provide room for the city's growing population.

At its April 30 meeting, Israel's cabinet gave the go-ahead to expropriate some 120 acres of land, about 70 per cent of it Arab-owned. The decision was taken despite stiff opposition of cabinet members from the left-wing Meretz bloc.

Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin defended the move, saying a territorial link to Jerusalem was needed for the suburbs of Ramot and Gilo, which are located near the projected building sites.

Egyptian Foreign Minister Amr Moussa said he hoped Israel would reconsider.

"This plan has sparked a fury in the region," Moussa told reporters Sunday. "We will ask Mr. Peres to change the Israeli decision."

A defiant Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Olmert said he wants to increase the proportion of Jews in the capital.

"This is a Jewish city," Olmert told the Associated Press. "Forget about making any compromise. We have no compromise in mind."

Olmert insisted the city is also planning to build housing for Arabs. But he added, "We are not playing games here. I am not trying to suggest that I want to develop Jerusalem so that hundreds of thousands of Arabs will be able to come here. I don't want them to come here ... I don't think it would be good for the city to mix it more than it is already."

Olmert said he hopes the ratio of Jews in Jerusalem — now about 72 per cent — would increase, and that he is trying to attract Jews to the city. But he said he does not expect the proportions to change drastically in the next 20 years.

Earlier last week, Palestinian Authority (PA) leader Yasser Arafat called the move "sheer aggression ... [and] an attempt to change the Palestinian map."

Despite the plans, Arafat said the peace process must go on.

"We have no alternative but to continue with all our efforts to achieve real peace here in this land, between our two peoples," Arafat said before meeting Peace Now activists at his offices in Gaza.

Palestinian negotiator Nabil Sha'ath said the planned land confiscation put the entire peace process, not just the Israeli-Palestinian track, in jeopardy.

And Palestinian official Saeb Erekat described the land moves as "the highest form of terrorism against the Palestinian people."

But Peres tried to play down the differences, telling last Sunday's cabinet meeting that some of the planned construction on the confiscated sites would also benefit the city's Arab population.

Peres also defended the move in Cairo, telling reporters that it "is not a political development.

"It is, if you want, a demographic one" reflecting the growth of Jerusalem," he said.

Peres added that he thought Israeli and Palestinian negotiators would meet their July 1 deadline for an accord on Palestinian elections and Israeli troop withdrawals.

Negotiators on issues surrounding the Palestinian elections have reported progress in their talks. But the more complex negotiations on the army redeployment in the West Bank have been moving far more slowly, amid Israel Defence Force concerns for security in the wake of continuing terror attacks.

Implementation of these two phases of the Palestinian self-rule accord is now almost a year behind schedule. According to the terms of the accord, Palestinian elections should have taken place last July.

Talks between the two sides regarding the final status of Jerusalem are slated to begin in May 1996.

Former Calgary rabbi helps to boost Jewish education

By LEORA FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

TEL AVIV — A former Calgary rabbi is spearheading a Bar-Ilan University effort to raise the level of Jewish education worldwide.

The university's Lookstein Centre for Jewish Education, headed by Rabbi Pinchas Hayman, has embarked on an ambitious plan to "save Jewish communities" that are threatened by assimilation.

"The idea is to target the communities most at risk and work together with these communities to revitalize them," explains Rabbi Hayman, who led an Orthodox congregation in Calgary before moving to Israel in 1988.

The Lookstein Centre has gathered information on the world's major Jewish population centres, looking at rates of assimilation, educational facilities and economic resources.

"We used this to develop a strategic plan for intervention in particular communities," says Rabbi Hayman, adding that the centre's top priorities are the communities of Argentina, Brazil and Ukraine.

The first two were chosen because of their large Jewish populations (over 400,000), high rate of intermarriage (nearly 70 per cent), and high proportion of children. Ukraine, which already has a number of Jewish insitutions, was selected in the hope that it can become a foothold for spreading Jewish education in Eastern Europe and the former Soviet Union.

Originally, North America was not considered a priority because it has its own resources, Rabbi Hayman says. But many North American communities have approached the Bar-Ilan centre for help in upgrading Jewish education. As a result, the centre has begun offering such services as evaluation of North American schools by educational experts, study programs in Israel for high school students (Grade 10 students of Montreal's Hebrew Academy are to spend part of the year in Israel under the auspices of one such program) and a novel Knesset Israel program for teaching students in the Diaspora about Israeli democracy. In addition, the centre offers a one-year sabbatical for senior educators (see box).

But the Lookstein Centre doesn't "export" standard Israeli-made teaching materials, says Rabbi Hayman. "We tailor make programs for specific communities and involve the educators and leaders of those communities in the process. They set the educational goals and we help them reach them."

Evaluation done by senior Israeli educators

The centre's evaluation is done by senior Israeli educators who are either from the community involved or know it well. The centre then provides a proposal for developing the educational resources of schools, emphasizing teacher training. After undergoing training, the teachers develop their own curriculum and educational materials using the centre as a resource.

"The days of sending Israeli shlichim (emissaries) to Jewish communities around the world are over," says Rabbi Hayman. "You can't market a product in Brazil the same way you would market it in Canada."

Rabbi Hayman believes good marketing is the key to success in Jewish education. "People buy products based on what they perceive as their needs. If they don't feel a need for Jewish identity why should they 'buy' it? Our people have to be market-sensitive because they are selling a product that most people don't even want."

Rabbi Hayman, who became director of the Lookstein Centre in October, says Bar-Ilan University is in an ideal position to service Jewish schools worldwide.

"We have the largest Jewish studies faculty in the world, an excellent school of education and a commitment to the preservation of Jewish heritage," he says.

The university's traditional orientation worries some non-religious educators. "They are concerned about religious extremism," says Rabbi Hayman. "But we are an academic institution, not a group of missionaries. We don't dictate. We work with educators of every Jewish outlook, helping them come closer to Jewish identity in ways that are meaningful to them. If they want to focus on Jewish art, we help them to do that. We don't force them to study prayer as well."

But Rabbi Hayman acknowledges that the Lookstein Centre will not train educators to teach ideas that run counter to its own religious convictions.

The centre's first major outreach project in Sao Paulo, Brazil, began with a contract to remake a single school; it is blossoming into a plan to develop programs for all Jewish communities in Brazil, and, possibly, South America.

"The rate of assimilation around the world is so great that there is no way we can regain even half of those Jews," says Rabbi Hayman. "But we are trying to save whatever can be saved of these shrinking Jewish communities."

Innovations at Lookstein

Sholom Brodt is designing a multimedia program for educating Jewish children in remote communities. Karmi Gross is developing what he believes will be the first high school course in Jewish philosophy.

Brodt, who teaches at Montreal's Herzlia High School, and Gross, the former director of Jewish studies at Vancouver's Maimonides Secondary School, are spending the year in Israel, pursuing their pet projects at the Lookstein Centre for Jewish Education at Bar-Ilan University.

They are among 15 senior educators from around the world taking part in the Centre's Professional Enrichment Program, now in its fifth year.

The program provides an opportunity for experienced educators to spend an academic year in Israel expanding their Judaic knowledge and educational skills, while deepening their connection to Israel. Participants receive full scholarships and a living stipend.

"For me, it is an opportunity to realize one of my dreams," says Brodt. The six-year curriculum he has developed for children age seven to 13 covers subjects from Torah and prayer to Jewish history and Hebrew.

The program, called the Simchat Shlomo Jewish Multimedia School (named after the late Rabbi Shlomo Carlebach), is suitable for places like Cornwall, Ont., or the Eastern Townships, says Brodt. Jewish leaders in Moncton, N.B., have already expressed interest in it.

"Bar-Ilan's expertise in Jewish education in general and interactive video education in particular was very useful," he says. He is now looking for funding to launch the project.

Gross says the year at the Lookstein Centre has been "an opportunity to continue to widen my horizons."

Of the Jewish philosophy course he developed, he says, "We usually assume students of this age are not up to the intellectual challenge of philosophy. But I have found that they are very receptive and insightful," he says. "I think it's important to teach this aspect of Judaism."

Of his year at the centre, he says, "To really educate students to have a love of Eretz Israel you have to have some of the spirit of Israel in you. So by filling myself up with the spirit of Eretz Israel I can infuse some of that into my students."

May 1:
• The main story in the Israeli media concerned the expropriation of Jerusalem-area land by the government. In expressing his full support of the decision, Prime Minister Rabin stated that he preferred that Arabs not live in the neighborhoods of Gilo and Maaleh Adumim. See the related story on page 33.

May 2:
• Ha'aretz reported that a formal plan for redeployment from the West Bank has been drawn up by the IDF. According to the plan, the IDF will redeploy at two month intervals out of Jenin, Tulkarm, Kalkilya, Nablus, Ramallah, and Bethlehem. Hebron was not listed in the plan. Quoting a senior military source, the newspaper said that the Palestinians seemed to agree with it.

• The Bank of Israel stated that the Gross Domestic Product (GDP) continues to expand. During the last three months of 1994 the GDP rose 3.6 percent. The media also reported that foreign currency reserves had increased in April to a record high of $9.5 billion due to the attraction of foreign investment to the country by the high interest rates offered by Israeli banks.

May 3:
• Yom Hazikaron.

• A special 27-hour program was broadcast by Channel 3; all of the names of Israel's war dead were read. Since the War of Independence, 18,220 soldiers have died in active duty.

May 4:
• Yom Ha'atzmaut.

• In honor of the holiday, newspapers do not publish.

• Three people in northern Galilee were injured by Katyusha rockets fired in the night from southern Lebanon. Property was also damaged.

May 5:
• Prime Minister Rabin departed for a weekend visit to Washington. Media report that peace with Syria, negotiations with the Palestinians, U.S. aid to Israel and the containment of Iran will be on the agenda for discussion.

Hussein goes on the offense attempting to bolster peace

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Jordan's King Hussein has gone on the offensive against hardline Jordanian groups opposed to normalizing ties with Israel.

In an effort to bolster support for the peace treaty he signed with Israel in October, the king last week invited members of the opposition from both houses of the Jordanian parliament to meet with him.

Hussein told the parliamentarians he intends to implement the historic accord both in letter and spirit.

Several professional organizations in Jordan have warned their membership not to get too friendly with Israelis.

Late last month, Jordan's National Union of Dentists warned its members they could face possible expulsion for treating Israelis, who often come to Jordan seeking cheaper dental services.

Similar directives against dealings with Israelis have been issued by other Jordanian professional associations, including those for doctors, lawyers and engineers.

Hussein appeared with Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin in an interview broadcast in Israel last Thursday, on Yom Ha'atzmaut.

Rabin called the Israeli-Jordanian peace treaty the greatest achievement of his career. Hussein said he hoped to speed up normalization of ties.

But despite the efforts of both leaders, developments reflect a different view among some Jordanians, more than half of whom are of Palestinian origin.

Israel Television reported that a Jordanian folklore troupe scheduled to participate in a dance festival in Ra'anana cancelled the performance after a Jordanian artists' union threatened to boycott the troupe if it made the visit.

Zagreb evacuation ruled out

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service and Jewish Telegraphic Agency

ZAGREB — This city's Jewish community is not planning to evacuate any of its members, despite rumors resulting from last week's attacks by rebel Serbs on Croatia's capital, according to the head of the Zagreb Jewish community.

Dunja Sprajc's comments came shortly after a barrage of Serb missile attacks landed in the heart of the city.

Last Tuesday, shells fell in downtown Zagreb, close to the Jewish community centre and the U.S. embassy. At least five people were killed and more than 100 injured in the attacks.

The Serb attacks came in response to an offensive by the Croatian government earlier in the week, which broke the "permanent ceasefire" signed last year by both groups.

No casualties in the Jewish community were reported. Of the 2,000 Jews in Croatia, about 1,400 live in Zagreb.

Sprajc denied news reports in Israel that the Zagreb community was preparing for the evacuation of Jewish children.

The Jewish Agency for Israel has offered help and suggested that the community prepare lists of children in the event of an evacuation.

Na'amat Talks to Israeli Women Soldiers About Domestic Violence

An often intense seminar on domestic violence sponsored by Na'amat Israel and CHEN, the Women's Army Corps, was an eye opener for the 200 women soldiers who attended, shattering the attitude "It can't happen to me."

The soldiers, who were taking officer's training courses, heard a panel of speakers comprised of Na'amat attorney, Daphne Boostan who spoke on Battered Women and the Law and Criminologist, Ronit Lev Ari, Director of Na'amat's Centres for the Prevention of Domestic Violence, who talked about Na'amat's role. Lev Ari reported that some 4000 non-commissioned and commissioned officers had taken part in Na'amat sponsored seminars on domestic violence. This generated 128 requests for counselling. Yaakov Raz, Police Commander of the Dan region dealt with police personnel's contribution to stopping the cycle of violence.

The all-day program provided information on what is being done to prevent and put a stop to domestic violence, on how to detect danger signs, where to turn for help and the role of government agencies, emergency facilities and the police. Each soldier was given a kit that included along with other material, Na'amat's brochures "Before the Battering" and "After the Battering."

Na'amat Canada Helps Build Women's Shelter and Counselling Centre

Na'amat Canada is raising funds to build a battered women's shelter in the Maoz Aviv neighborhood of Tel Aviv. The project, now underway, will house 18 women and their children along with a counselling centre with a 24-hour hot-line. The building will include consultation and treatment rooms as well as a library. Each year, the Na'amat Centre for the Prevention of Domestic violence receives about 5000 inquiries from battered women - 2000 of that number from the Tel Aviv area. Na'amat Canada will underwrite 50 percent of the building costs with the Tel Aviv Foundation. The Facility will be run under the directorship of Ronit Lev Ari.

In the Schools

Na'amat Israel's Prevention of Violence Department has expanded its education programme to reach into the public schools. Work has begun with teachers instructing them how to identify and deal with suspected child abuse. An informational booklet written by Ronit Lev Ari, criminologist and head of the department and Bruria Vionitz, a retired expert teacher was published by Na'amat Israel. Curriculum guidelines were introduced to help children learn to control violent abusive outbursts which are harmful to themselves and other children. Still in the pilot stage, this programme will be expanded to incorporate more and more schools.

Jewish groups urge Ottawa to continue process

Department to Citizenship and Immigration.

"We think it is a significant step forward," said Canadian Jewish Congress president Irving Abella.

"It would be inconceivable to halt the process now that the war crimes dossier has received unprecedented momentum. One day more in Canada for any of these alleged war criminals is one day too many."

Sol Littman, the Canadian representative of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre, said that while he congratulates Justice Minister Allan Rock and Citizenship and Immigration Minister Sergio Marchi "for keeping their word and proceeding with some degree of despatch against these people ... I feel this is a piece of tokenism."

"We must not stop now," agreed David Matas, chair of B'nai Brith's war crimes committee. "The accumulation of cases shows there are still a significant number of people in Canada who are suspected of involvement in war crimes and crimes against humanity."

Dueck, a 76-year-old retired auto mechanic, is represented by Ottawa lawyer Donald Bayne. Bayne earlier represented accused war criminal Michael Pawlawski against charges of murdering 490 Jews and Poles during World War II.

The government's case against Pawlawski fell apart in 1992 when a judge refused to permit an evidence-gathering commission to travel to the Soviet Union to videotape witnesses' testimony.

In a letter to Citizenship and Immigration, Bayne asks why his client is being subject to denaturalization proceedings when the allegations against him "should properly be the subject of a Canadian prosecution subject to the requirements and criminal law standards of...the Criminal Code."

"Given the government's success with the criminal route, no wonder he wants the government to prosecute under the criminal law," Littman commented.

Liberal MP Walt Lastewka (St. Catharines), however, agreed with Bayne, saying "I'm uncomfortable going through the immigration route instead of the criminal law route."

In a telephone interview with The CJN, Lastewka said "I feel very uncomfortable that we're going back 50 years...How are we going to go forward? These are people in their 70s and 80s."

Lastewka, who is of Ukrainian heritage, said he holds that view even though one of his uncles, Walter Luchka, was killed in Auschwitz. Other uncles and cousins were "massacred" during World Wars I and II, he said.

Congress Plenary

Hecht has allowed others to sell his virtues to the electorate. A letter signed by prominent community leaders like Irwin Kotler, Jack Cummings, Senator Leo Kolber, Sheila Kussner and Joseph Benarroch extols Hecht as being able to "inspire us" as an accomplished businessman, experienced in all aspects of Jewish communal life and in academia."

They claim Hecht has provided "direction and vision while always encouraging dialogue and diversity of opinion in building consensus on behalf of our community. He is an effective voice for all of us in Canada and abroad."

Hecht and Hershon are scheduled to take part in a meet-the-candidates session on the first day of the plenary, May 14 at 5:45 p.m. The actual format had not been determined by last week, said communications director Mike Cohen, but there was no intention of having Hershon and Hecht engage in face-to-face dialogue.

QUALIFIED VOTERS

Be Sure of Your Vote

June 8th, 1995

You can help make sure YOUR NAME is on the NEW LIST of VOTERS for the Ontario Provincial Election.

If you are eligible and wish to vote, it's up to you to make sure your name is on the NEW LIST of VOTERS. You must answer (or provide the information for someone else to answer) the questions the Enumerators will be asking. This will make sure your name does appear on the NEW LIST of VOTERS so that you can vote.

CAN YOU VOTE ON JUNE 8TH?

These are the questions the Enumerators will ask.

(1) On Election Day will you be 18 years of age or over?

(2) On Election Day will you be a Canadian Citizen?

(3) On Election Day will you have resided in Ontario for the preceding 6 months?

(4) On Election Day will you be a resident at this address?

They should also ask if there are other eligible voters resident at your address.

WHAT YOU SHOULD KNOW ABOUT ENUMERATION

The two Enumerators who will soon be calling at your door should produce their appointment form and identify themselves and the purpose of their visit.

If you are at home, or if someone else can answer their questions, the Enumerators will complete a Form 301 for you and for any other qualified members of the household. The names of all eligible voters should then appear on the NEW LIST of VOTERS.

If they miss you on their first visit, they will be making other visits or "call backs". Please give them access in order to help make sure their NEW LIST of VOTERS is as complete as possible.

The phone numbers for Electoral District Returning Offices are available from Directory Assistance. If you require information specific to your Electoral District, ask for "Elections Ontario" and then the Electoral District by name.

The Tel Aviv Museum of Art has opened an exhibition of never-before viewed drawings by Italian painter and sculptor Amadeo Modigliani. Born into an Italian Jewish family, Modigliani moved to Paris at 22, where he was influenced by Toulouse-Lautrec, Picasso, Cezanne, and sculptor Constantin Brancusi before dying of tuberculosis at 35. The 180 pieces in this exhibit represent Modigliani's early artistic efforts from 1906 to 1914.

The Tel Aviv Museum of Art is the largest such museum in Israel, with several permanent collections and about 15 temporary exhibitions each year. When the museum first opened to the public 63 years ago, it was located in the home of Tel Aviv's first mayor, Meir Dizengoff. It has since expanded significantly in order to acommodate 450,000 visitors a year. The museum is located at 27 Shaul Hamelech Blvd. Phone: 03-695-7361.

Peak Periods in Paris: The Paris Tourist Office publishes a guide for choosing one's dates while visiting the French capital. For 14 consecutive years, Paris has hosted more conferences and conventions than any other city in the world, resulting in a need for hotel reservations at certain busy times. The Paris Tourist Office strongly recommends reservations for the following peak periods: June 10 to 19, July 1 to 3, and all of September, the first three weeks of October, and Nov. 7 to 11. The balance of July and August is a low season when rates can be negotiated.

Cashing in on golf's growth

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Joshua Cooper can't believe all the free publicity he's been getting.

When Blue Jays manager Cito Gaston was asked what he thought about the baseball strike, the media had to track him down on a golf course in Florida.

When reporters located basketball great Michael Jordan for an interview, they found him getting ready to play a round of golf on a sunny, southern course.

When kids see their heroes getting ready to tee off, the message comes across that it's cool to be a golfer, Cooper believes.

That's probably one of the fac-

Richardson Greenshields

With the exception of some unique in-house products, today's full service investment firms are able to offer investors investment choices and services that are basically comparable.

It is, therefore, extremely important to select an investment adviser who is qualified and willing to provide the kind of individual service to meet your needs, says Hal Simons, vice-president and investment adviser at Richardson Greenshields' Richmond Hill branch. This includes preliminary discussions and the development of personalized investment strategies, regular communication, accessibility and ongoing timely information.

Educating clients to fully understand their investments and any risks involved is a priority and one of the major responsibilities of an investment adviser, Simons says. This can be accomplished by telephone coversations, face-to-face meetings and information sent by fax or mail.

Until recently, most husbands took care of the family investments and their wives had limited investment knowledge. Simons feels that women should become informed and aware of investments.

He regularly holds a series of free seminars for women (men are also welcome) at which he discusses investment terms, investment options, investment planning, risk and volatility, interest and dividend income, Registered Retirement Savings Plans (RRSP) and tax-assisted investments. "I try to take the mystery out of investing," he said.

Simons keeps the seminars small — usually from 10 to 14 people — to encourage participation and questions. He invites CJN readers to contact him at 905-882-1627 if they wish to attend.

Simons spends most of his time meeting with current and future clients, either at his office or in their offices or homes. He assesses their current financial situation and discusses their short-term and longer term goals, their risk tolerance and their level of investment knowledge.

There are numerous investment strategies, he said, which can be tailored to achieve financial goals by using combinations of individual equities, mutual funds and the Sovereign Investment Program offered by Richardson Greenshields.

Nathan Mechanic (416-365-5570), an investment adviser at the downtown Richardson Greenshields' branch, is excited about the Sovereign Investment Program, which is now a little more than two years old.

The minimum investment for Sovereign is $50,000, and with that investors have access to some of the best money managers in the world. The managers are hired and monitored by the U.S.-based Frank Russell Co., which helps large companies select pension managers. "Normally you would need a portfolio of several million dollars to access these managers," said Mechanic.

Institutional money managers aim for consistent above average, long-term growth and consistent returns; the more volatile the investment, the more likely that a downturn in the markets will wipe out any previous gains. Sovereign assets are invested in a mix of Canadian, U.S. and international equities, as well as Canadian fixed income.

Although Sovereign clients have individually tailored portfolios, the returns on three model portfolios are an indication of average returns on investments since the program's inception: RRSP and non-RRSP returns were 28.68 per cent and 28.63 per cent for the conservative portfolio; 34.47 per cent and 30.94 per cent for the moderate one; and 39.08 per cent and 38.01 per cent for the aggressive model.

Sovereign's charges are 2.5 per cent of the assets under management and include broker's commission, management fees and other costs. The charges are about the same as management fees for most equity mutual funds. Sovereign's charges, however, are currently tax deductible as an investment counselling fee.

Since the Sovereign program is professionally managed, it is ideal for busy or unsophisticated investors with money that needs to be invested, said Mechanic.

tors responsible for the growth of his business, Par Golf Camps. In the three years since it opened, registration has shot up from 28 youngsters in the inaugural season to more than 100 last summer. This year Cooper expects the camp to be sold out with 160 golfers registered.

Cooper, 25, is the owner, manager, secretary, head pro and chief bottle-washer of the Toronto-area golf enterprise. The camp offers instruction in the fundamentals of golf, giving kids 7-18 the opportunity to start their careers on the right foot (unless they're using a short iron, in which case they'll have to put a little more weight on the left).

Cooper believes several additional factors are working to make Par Golf Camps a success. One is the phenomenal growth in popularity of the game itself. Last year, golf grew by 17 per cent in Ontario with more than 110,000 junior golfers taking up the sport.

Citing statistics from U.S. golf magazines, Cooper pointed out that "from 1995 to the year 2000, 20 million North Americans will take up golf for the first time." In addition, parents who love the game want to introduce their kids to it, Cooper said.

At $399 for a two-week session, the cost is affordable. The price includes instruction, use of clubs, range balls and green fees for two 18-hole games.

Fees at American camps, by comparison, begin at $850 per week (U.S.), he points out.

Kids are bussed into the camp around 9.15 a.m. Instruction begins with emphasis on grip, alignment and posture and moves on to chipping, pitching, sandplay and hitting longer clubs. There is also a segment on the rules and etiquette of golf.

The camp is located at the Annandale Golf & Country Club and the kids practise in a large open field and at the driving range. Once a week, they play a full 18 holes.

Last year, Cooper expanded his venture into adult camps. Grown-up duffers and those wishing to polish their games are offered a three-day weekend program at either Annandale or the Royal Woodbine Golf Club.

With a four-to-one student to teacher ratio, the camp provides expert instruction by carded professionals, Cooper said. Participants play a round of golf each afternoon. Cost for the program at Annandale is $275, at Royal Woodbine, $375.

Operating a golf camp came naturally to Cooper, in fact, it's almost in his blood. His grandfather, Michael Lawrence, owned Annandale and his uncle, Michael Lyons, is the current club manager.

Cooper began hitting golf balls at nine but he took the game more seriously at around 18. Four years later, he got his pro teaching card from the U.S. Golf Teachers Association.

Expansion planned

A graduate of an international business program, Cooper found job hunting tough and, "I thought, if I'm going to do something, I'd have to come up with something on my own."

A "graduate" of Camp Timberlane, where he was camper, counsellor and coordinator, he hit on the idea of using the open field at Annandale to stage his own golf camp, bringing together three elements of his life — camper, golfer and businessman.

With the success of the venture, Cooper hopes to expand to four junior camps in the Toronto-Hamilton area in the next few years. He's also acquired the exclusive Manitoba and Ontario distribution rights for Nitelite products, luminescent balls and pegs that can be used to play night golf.

For as any true golfer knows, nothing as mundane as nightfall should get in the way of a good round of golf.

Scitex, Xerox in strategic relationship

JERUSALEM — Xerox Corp. and Scitex Corp. last week announced a strategic relationship that will enable both firms to advance their positions in the short-run digital color printing marketplace.

Under the agreement, the companies will share core technological competencies and market expertise. The first offering will be a printing system, to be distributed by Scitex, that incorporates its digital front end and provides productive workflow management with a high speed full color print engine developed by Fuji Xerox.

Polaroid may invest in Israel

JERUSALEM — Polaroid Corp. is considering a number of business opportunities with local print technology firms following a recent visit to the country by president and chair Macallister Booth.

Booth was part of a delegation of leading CEOs from the United States. During his stay, Booth met with Scitex, Indigo, I-sight and Elgotech.

Booth said he was very impressed with the companies he visited. "They are first-class companies, first-class technologies and people," he said. "I don't see these companies losing their competitive edge."

Foreign currency reserves hit new high

JERUSALEM — Israel's foreign currency reserves grew by $566 million (US) last month to a record $9.51 billion, the Bank of Israel said.

The increase is attributed to the continuing purchase of Israeli shekels in recent months, which resulted from high domestic interest rates enacted by the central bank to suppress inflation.

U.K. company buys Bezek shares

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Cable & Wireless (C & W) confirmed last week that it was the buyer of a 7.01 per cent stake in Bezek. C & W released a statement saying it had bought the stake for $63 million (US), which will entitle it to appoint one director to Bezek's board.

C & W purchased a 4.7 per cent stake previously and additional purchases brought the stake up to 7.01 per cent. Lord Young said his company was "pleased to have established this strategic shareholding in advance of the government's announcement about its further plans for the company.

"Our aim is to build on this initial investment and secure a strategic partnership with Bezek for the further development of telecommunication services in Israel."

Young added that acquisition of the Bezek stake was the first step in the longer-term aim of creating for C & W a fourth region of strategic significance, along with the Far East (where it owns Hong Kong Telecom), Europe and the Caribbean.

He said he anticipated significant growth in the demand for telecommunications following the PLO-Israel peace accord.

The purchase remained a mystery before the announcement last week. Till then, Britain's second biggest telecommunications company only issued a "no comment" when speculation arose.

This purchase is one of the more interesting developments in recent Israeli corporate and capital market history. It means that one of the world's telecommunications giants, is effectively stating that it is interested in at least a strategic stake in — and very possibly control of — Bezek. And that statement is not via some press release or cheap talk, but via an aggressive, anonymous stock market purchase.

Consequently, the Israeli government's apparent indifference to the share purchase is puzzling. There is nothing wrong with C & W's buying the stock or indeed taking control of Bezek should things so unfold. But it is indicative of how little the government understands the capital market that it seems barely aware of the development.

Homegrown actor makes good

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It's a case of hometown boy makes good for Avery Saltzman, playing the male lead in the musical Into The Woods by Stephen Sondheim, which runs at St. Lawrence Centre to May 20.

Saltzman plays the pivotal role of The Baker in a story based on famous fairy tales with adult messages about how to treat others.

The Toronto character actor and singer is excited about appearing in his first Sondheim production, particularly since he believes the message of Into The Woods can be related to the Holocaust and the partisans who went into the woods to fight back.

Saltzman recalls with fondness his appearances in plays at the Yiddish Theatre in New York, including The Dybbuk. He worked for two years in New York and two years in Los Angeles.

An actor since the age of 13, he says his parents, Pearl and George Saltzman of Thornhill, have been very supportive. His father, now 77, is semi-retired but still works in the family's licensed clothing business run by Avery's brothers, Marsh and Lorne. One of Avery's five nephews, 13-year-old Joshua, also has his eye on show business as a director.

Next up for Saltzman is a role as the clothing designer in the Toronto production of Sunset Boulevard.

And They Shall Be My People: An American Rabbi and His Congregation by Paul Wilkes

What is it like to serve as rabbi to a middle-size Conservative congregation in Worcester, Mass.? This is what Paul Wilkes, a Catholic journalist, wanted to discover. So, he spent a year with 42-year-old Rabbi J. Rosenbaum, documenting his hard-working daily round of activities, watching in admiration as the rabbi tried — largely unsuccessfully — to stem the tide of congregational assimilation and apathy.

The rabbi is harried and frustrated. In his 60-hour week he counsels a couple who want to raise their baby as a Jew though the expectant mother has no desire to convert to Judaism; leads an acculturation class for Russian immigrants; officiates at a ritual circumcision of the son of marginally observant Jews; visits a congregant dying of Alzheimer's; hustles to get congregants to join a trip to Israel that he is leading; tells a tale about a Hebrew-speaking parakeet to the Jewish day school's nursery school class; and haggles with the synagogue's board of directors over a new contract.

In sum, the rabbi takes on the role of social worker, pastoral advisor, school principal and guide to the intricacies of Jewish law. He is also compelled to deal with matters beyond his competence and training, such as the complicated budgetary needs and problems of his 550-member congregation.

In a recent interview, the author commented on disquieting symptoms he had noted in his survey of congregational life. "Many members," he said, "tend to regard the synagogue the same way as they do the country club. They feel they're paying dues in return for service and you'd better provide it." And then there is the squabbling. "Yes," said Wilkes, "Christian churches suffer from the same thing, but I've never — never — seen it happen the way I did at Beth Israel." He admits that perhaps he didn't understand the traditional Jewish penchant for argumentation.

Rabbi Rosenbaum told the author, "It takes a great effort to be a Jew today, to come to shul, to observe Shabbat. We're Americans. We don't like to be told we have to do anything." But he insists, "The laws, the mitzvot, give your life a structure, make it more meaningful. The rituals draw a person closer to God, connecting people to other people who have the same goals. That's what gives it extra power and gives you confidence; you are part of a community of history . . . It's pressure-filled, anxiety provoking. But it is ultimately exhilarating."

Wilkes follows the rabbi on a congregational tour to Israel. There had been a controversy as to whether younger members should travel with older ones and with the rabbi. Would they be hampered by slower travellers or by the rabbi who might force them to endure a "religious" trip.

The portrait of the rabbi presented is that of a person imbued with ideals and confronted with a largely uninvolved and often unsympathetic congregation.

The depiction of the Worcester congregation seems somewhat overdrawn and negative. In my experience, congregational life has never seemed so spiritually enervated or meanspirited. Nevertheless, this is a sober analysis that should be of widespread concern. It is tragic enough that two-thirds of American Jewry is unaffiliated. Will so many in the remaining third remain alienated and indifferent?

The author's reporting is lucid and respectful, fact-filled and absorbing. Perhaps the final words belong to him. When asked about the future of Judaism, he replied, "Well, He's an old God with a sense of humor, and He's going to be around, and Judaism is going to be around. We're not talking about extinction."

Shirley's Kidz at Beth El: From Broadway to Beth El is the program Shirley's Kidz — Bonnie, Martin and Marci — have lined up for their guest appearance in the auditorium of the Beth El Centre, 1003 Steeles Ave. W. (at Bathurst), North York, on May 15 at 1 p.m. The trio will perform Broadway favorites, including material from Fiddler On The Roof. $2 admission ($1 for members) includes refreshments.

An Evening of Yiddish: Taking place at the OISE Building, this event features Yiddish readings with English translation and discussion. Co-presenters are Grace Feuerverger and Frieda Forman of OISE and Sylvia Lustgarten of the Committee for Yiddish. Readings include stories from Found Treasures: Stories By Yiddish Women Writers (1994); selections from Yiddish writer I.L. Peretz read by Henia Reinhartz; and lyrics by Mordechaj Gebirtig, read and discussed by Manfred Lemm. OISE 12th-floor boardroom, May 17 at 7:30 p.m. Admission free.

Songs of Mordechaj Gebirtig: If the Yiddish evening described above leaves you wanting more, then you must attend The Songs of Mordechaj Gebirtig, played and sung by Manfred Lemm, at the Leah Posluns Theatre, 4588 Bathurst St., on May 18 at 8 p.m.

Gebirtig (1877-1942), a carpenter from Krakow, is considered one of the most important poets in the folklore of Yiddish songs. His songs mirror the life of Eastern European Jews with their joys and sorrows, up to and including the political and personal horrors of the war years. Gebirtig was murdered by Nazi thugs.

Lemm, a German singer born in Berlin in 1946, has researched and performed Gebirtig's music for more than 10 years. To date Lemm has transcribed over 90 texts, setting some to new music. The initiator and organizer of a European Yiddish Festival, he is credited with having saved the works of Gebirtig from oblivion.

Tickets are $10. For reservations, call the Committee for Yiddish at 416-635-2883 ext. 155, or the Goethe Institute at 416-924-3327. Tickets also available at the door.

School Play: The poignant comedy, Today I Am A Fountain Pen, by Israel Horovitz is being presented at T.L. Kennedy Secondary School, 100 Hurontario St., Mississauga, May 11 and 12 at 7:30 p.m.

Formerly part of a CBC-TV trilogy, I Am A Fountain Pen is based on stories by author Morley Torgov. It deals with Jewish home life in Sault Ste. Marie, Ont., in the 1940s and specifically the coming of age of Irving Yanover, a precocious, musically-gifted preteen.

Influential Women Lecture Series: A three-part lecture series featuring Joan Rivers, Pamela Wallin and Naomi Wolf in one package, is slated for June 6, August 23 and Sept. 27 at Roy Thomson Hall in Toronto. For series tickets or information, call the box office at 416-872-4255.

Women Photographers from Weimer: The largest and most comprehensive examination of the photographic work of women in Germany during the late 1920s and early 1930s, featuring more than 160 photographs by 51 photographers, is on view in Women Photographers of the Weimar Republic, at The Jewish Museum, New York, until July 30.

Some of the artists presented would be labeled by Nazi propaganda of the 1930s as "degenerate" and "dangerous" to the Aryan ideal of family and femininity. About half of the women whose works are featured in the exhibition are known to be Jewish.

In Brief: Jazz violinist Lenny Solomon performs a free concert at the Waterfall Stage, First Canadian Place, Toronto, at 12:15 p.m. May 25. 416-862-0803.

Composers Judith Weir and Linda Bouchard conduct the Gryphon Trio, Maria Berard, Stephen Clarke, Robert Cram, Douglas Perry and the Encounters Chamber Ensemble during Encounters '95. The event is presented by Soundstreams Canada and CBC Stereo's Two New Hours. Glenn Gould Studio, Toronto, May 16 at 8 p.m. For tickets ($15), call 416-205-5555.

Composers take note that the Toronto Arts Council grants application deadline is July 4. Phone: 416-392-6800.

The art of Nissan Engel is featured in a one-man show at Klim Fine Art Gallery, 1238 Centre St., Thornhill, Ont. through May 29. Phone: 905-882-0884.

Interview With Irving Abella

Viewpoints: Professor Abella, in your installation address three years ago, you stated that your top priority was not the fight against antisemitism but the fight against assimilation and intermarriage. Would you like to comment on what you think has transpired on this question during the three years of your presidency?

Abella: I never once mentioned the word intermarriage. Our major concern is no longer the rate of antisemitism but the rate of assimilation. I think that Congress now has to ensure that we enter and continue on in the 21st Century as strongly as we are leaving the 20th Century. We are a comfortable, integrated, well-off community, and we've "made it". Our concern – we Jews always have concerns – are for our children. We ask ourselves: Will they remain Jewish?

We are the fastest growing Jewish community in the Diaspora, the fourth largest Jewish community in the world. We have surpassed Great Britain, and are approaching the number of Jews in Russia – so we are a dynamic community. But will it last? Here I think the major problem is in our universities. Universities are a great wasteland for Canadian Jewry; it is here that we are losing our kids. We're not doing enough for them; we're not supplying them with expertise or funding. Most of them are leaving home for the first time when they enter university; they are then most susceptible to a variety of influences, and we don't provide them with much support. We live in a society in which being Jewish is one option among many and we're not providing them with an attractive Jewish option.

When I came into Congress, I stated that we ought to become involved in the "continuity" battle, which is not our major mandate – that's the Federation mandate – but we would do what we could. So, we have held several conferences, and for the first time we brought in students to be officers of Congress. One of the twenty members of the Officers Committee is a student. I mandated that all Congress committees have students on them. We set up a committee on Education and Continuity, we became part of the Federation Task Force on Continuity, and we have done what we could. We have travelled across the country raising the issue, encouraging the Jewish community to pay attention to the needs of our young, bringing as many of our young people into the community as we could and making it a high priority issue for us. Have we been successful? Well, we've made it a major item on the Jewish agenda. The Federations have now raised enormous amounts of money to do something about this question and we shall continue to do what we can to help. But we must remember that it's not simply a Congress mandate.

Viewpoints: Both Federations and Congress are organizations of the type I would call secular, that is, organizations that appeal to all Jews without regard for religious affiliation, or commitment for that matter. It's quite a common form of Jewish organization in modern Diaspora. In terms of continuity, can membership in Federations and Congress provide the identification and sense of commitment to the long term Jewish future as secular organizations or is it necessary to have some kind of religious component to ensure that?

Abella: Our concern in with those young people who are not affiliated. I think that the affiliated, the Orthodox do not have a severe problem in terms of continuity. Our major concern as a community ought to be with those people who aren't affiliated, who aren't religious, who don't go to synagogue regularly, which is the case of the majority of our Jewish young people. We ought to teach them that being Jewish is something more than memory, it's something more than religion, it's something more than looking backwards. We ought to talk to them about compassion, about equity, about being part of a community that has achieved much and that we can take much pride in. This is where Congress and the Federations play a role.

My major mandate on coming into Congress was to stress the two prefixes – Congress is Canadian and Jewish. And so at the beginning of my mandate, when Canada was in severe trouble, I thought it very important that we play as paramount a role as we possibly could in the Constitutional debate, in the National unity debate, in doing what we could to keep the country together. We joined the "Yes" committee, we travelled across the country making speeches. We became an organization with all the attributes of a "Yes" committee which gave us access to television, and nevertheless we lost. But, in doing so, I think we achieved a fairly high profile and a great deal of credibility which allows us then to play an important role in the public policy debate still going on in this country.

Since we are now recognized as spokesperson for the Jewish community, we are now involved in a wide variety of activities such as gun control, immigration reform, discrimination on sexual orientation, all of which have very little to do with Jewish issues. This is what we have managed to do in Congress during the last three years.

Abella: It's an agenda for an organization that wants to present itself as an advocate for human rights, as an advocate for equity. What is a Jewish organization if it is not going to fight for the rights of the oppressed? Who knows more about oppression than we do, about injustice than we do, about being refugees than we do? So, what we have done is lent our expertise, our experience, our credibility to less well-off groups. I see that as a very important statement in terms of continuity because it lets students, and our young people know that being Jewish is something more than going to synagogue, it's more than simply remembering the Holocaust. It means helping others, it means being involved in the debates in the country in which you live, it's being involved in progressive issues, it's being involved in the fight for justice.

Viewpoints: So Congress then has become a vehicle for the integration of Jews into Canadian life to the fullest extent?

Abella: I think Congress has done that for years. We began Congress 75 years ago as an organization of Canadian Jews but for all Canadians. That is why we do not limit ourselves to just Jewish issues but to a variety of issues which only marginally impact on us but are Jewish concerns – justice, human rights, civil liberties.

Viewpoints: You're talking about social action, but social action for universal as well as Jewish causes only?

Abella: I'm not sure you can differentiate between Jewish and universal.

Viewpoints: Most so-called social actions up to now from what I've seen have been concerned with Jewish problems. For example, marching to the Soviet Embassy with signs saying "let my people go". That was considered social action. I never saw anyone marching with placards saying we need more gun control.

Abella: We have. Congress has taken a position on gun control. We have also sent enormous amounts of food and supplies to the ex-Yugoslavia. These are issues that go beyond simply advocating for the freedom of the Soviet Jewry. They are important issues, they are issues that are of concern to the Jewish community because we are after all Canadian citizens and concerned.

Viewpoints: All of us have been attending I don't know how many conferences on the question we're discussing – Jewish continuity. I've gone to more conferences than I can count and they all come up with the same answer – more

EDITOR'S NOTEBOOK

It has become a Viewpoints tradition to interview the outgoing President of Congress just prior to the next Plenary which this year begins on May 14th. Accordingly, we present as our lead article a wide-ranging conversation we recently had with Irving Abella who has come to the end of his three year tenure as Congress President.

First, the good news. Abella feels that Congress is now recognized by Jews and non-Jews alike as the spokesperson for all Canadian Jewry, and therefore can articulate a Jewish position on issues which arise. This was not always the case, as we all know, and is today the situation in very few Jewish communities across the world.

Abella also stated that Canadian Jewry is respected by these communities as being more "Jewish" by almost every standard: higher day school enrolment, lower intermarriage, more involved in Zionistic activities, higher per capita contributions to all Jewish fund-raising both for Israel and locally.

Most of our conversation was devoted to Abella's deep concern about the lack of interest by young Jewish adults in both religion and Jewish Community affairs. Abella outlined the various initiatives he has launched to address this major problem, even though Federations across Canada and not Congress have been charged by our national leadership with responsibility for the campaign to promote Jewish "continuity" (as it is now termed).

Sally Zerker has sent us a detailed analysis of Rabin's Peace Plan, itemizing very carefully the reasons why she feels it has been launched at an inopportune time and in addition has been mishandled by the Rabin government. As a result, she is very concerned that success will not be achieved in the immediate future and perhaps not in the longer term.

Emil Fackenheim, who lives in Israel, takes umbrage at the persistent carping at the heroic image of Israel's founders. Zionist heroes are being deconstructed and he feels it is time to remember their true heroism, when they went ahead and declared the State of Israel despite the unanimous opinion of military experts throughout the world that Israel would be annihilated by the six Arab armies facing them.

Rabbi Dow Marmur has provided a very thoughtful answer to the question being asked by many young Jewish adults: "Why Do We Need Ritual?" The basic answer he feels is that human beings require ritual to give them a sense of their own identity and bind them to their own native group. Proof of this is the fact that throughout history, every civilization develops its own rituals which become the common heritage of its members and if they are deprived of it, they lose hope and, like our aboriginal Canadians, turn to suicide.

Aviva Ravel has sent us a touching story of a child who reaches the age of twelve and is told she is too old to receive Chanukah presents. The true dénouement is a surprise told with skill and simplicity.

Jewish education. But there is no definition of what kind of "more Jewish education" is meant. Now, you just listed a number of issues normally termed "universal social action" and said they obviously belong to our tradition and our religious values – that would be news to most young people, I think.

Abella: I think it's important to stress that compassion for the oppressed is part of our Jewish tradition and our Jewish values and it is something we ought to stress to our young people, the fact that being Jewish is not just fighting for Jewish causes. Fighting for other peoples' causes is also fighting for Jewish causes, for by helping them we help ourselves, by helping other communities we become a community ourselves, and I think that is an important message for the students who may see us as a parochial, particularistic organization.

Viewpoints: I think that all of us here would agree with that. The problem is, as we discussed earlier here before the interview started, that we don't have any structured way of seeing to it that all young Jews who go beyond elementary Hebrew or Day School reach the point where they can understand these questions and can be taught these answers: before that, in the elementary grades, they're given information on rituals and holidays, a little bit of history and so on, but the theology of Judaism you cannot teach a 10 or 11 year old. It's got to be college age, and by that time you've lost them.

Abella: It's a difficult thing to do. I agree that we can't go forward as a community simply by looking backward. We can't survive as a community simply on memory. We can't survive simply on recalling antisemitic events. The generation that is coming of age that was not brought up as many of us were, with the important memories of Jewish history was part of our life. We were brought up with the golden years of Israel, with Israel heroes, we were brought up in the shadow of the Holocaust, and remember all of that. The new generation came of age with their memories of Israel being the Intefada. And so, our commitment to Israel is primordial, theirs is more voluntary and they have to work harder at it. And I think that we have to provide them with a vision that we are not providing them, we have to tell them why it's important for Jews to survive. I think one of the major problems confronting Canadian Jewry is that this is a multicultural society, an absorptive society, it gives our young people and all of us choices we never had before. I think the major challenge confronting contemporary Jewish society is: can we survive in an egalitarian, multicultural, open society? Will we be an identifiable community given the forces surrounding us? And that is something we will have to struggle for and with over the next generation.

Viewpoints: Do you think Canadian Jewry is better equipped than most Diaspora communities to achieve that objective?

Abella: I think we are better equipped. We have organizations that few other Diaspora communities have. We have the highest Day School enrolment of any Diaspora community, we are far more generous in terms of our philanthropy, we're far more Zionistic, we're closer to Europe in many ways. I think that if one compares the assimilation rates here and elsewhere, we are far better off.

Viewpoints: Let's turn that around a bit. It is often argued that Canada is a generation behind the U.S. in social trends. If, indeed, that is the case, then maybe we are being too complacent here, maybe the kinds of phenomena they observe now in the U.S. may well be the problems in Canada in the first quarter of the 21st century. Is there reason to believe that the development of Canadian Jewry will follow a different path than American Jewry or will we simply lag by a certain number of years?

Abella: I think that one of the great myths of Diaspora life is that we are a generation behind American Jewry. I think we're different. We've developed at a different pace, in many ways we're ahead of them. We accept multiculturalism, we accept hyphenated Canadianism and the Americans don't. We accept collective rights, we honour collective rights, we accept and respect minorities, the Americans don't. So, in many ways, we are far more able to confront a free society and survive with a unique and vibrant Jewish community than the Americans. After all, when everybody is a hyphenated Canadian, being a Jewish Canadian is no different; whereas in America, there is an ethos, there is a melting pot, there is a structure for Americans to which to assimilate. We Canadians have very little to assimilate into. We don't have an overweening ambition or absorptive culture; we don't have a collection of heroes and myths the way the Americans do. And this is why multiculturalism can flourish here.

Viewpoints: As I understand our experts, when they talk about a generation behind, they always say a generation behind in acculturation which means absorption and disappearance and the underlying thesis is, we may be behind, but we're on the same road.

Abella: I think some of the problems are the same but we treat them differently. We respect different ideas, we handle problems differently, we have a different culture, and I think we will deal with the problems of assimilation differently.

Viewpoints: Would a Jewish Studies program teach that to college-age youth?

Rabin's "Peace" Policy

by Sally F. Zerker

When the handover of Gaza and Jericho to the PLO took place in May, 1994, I awoke that day on a splendid Jerusalem morning that spoke to me of sunshine, glistening hills, and perhaps of peace to come. It was not a joyous day in Israel, however. There were no happy celebrations or grand ceremonies. Rather, what I observed both before and after the transfer, when I had the opportunity to interview Israelis from all walks of life, was a very cautious acceptance of the Rabin government policy. The accord with the PLO, according to most people with whom I spoke, was highly risky, probably unlikely to succeed, but nevertheless had to be tried. Because, if nothing else, they felt compelled to take the present risk so that they might never regret a lost opportunity sometime down the road.

The allure of a potential end to the war with the Arabs that had been Israel's lot since its inception was the critical factor in producing this widespread – although not universal – attitude. There certainly were some individuals I interviewed who were adamantly opposed to the Oslo Declaration of Principles (DOP) and all that was intended to result from that. But, for myself, a visitor whose sons do not have to serve in the Israel Defence Force, and one who appreciates the ongoing hazards Israeli men experience from boyhood until late middle-age while in compulsory military service, I believed Israelis were far better judges of the situation than was I. And so I didn't make my own assessment of the Israeli government's agreement with the PLO. I relied on the opinion of those who had the daily burdens of war, terror, army service, and the burial of their loved ones.

But one should never forego reason and analysis. It's much too easy to delude oneself either because of euphoria or desperation, and ultimately there's always a price to pay for delusion. The cost to Israel of such mindlessness is now evident, as it struggles with a failed policy from which it cannot extricate itself. Even many of those Israelis on the left of the political spectrum who were the most ardent supporters of the pact with the PLO have become disenchanted. "With a sense of lost hope," writes Clyde Haberman of the New York Times (21/02/95), "they are asking themselves what went wrong". On reflection, it is clear that although my personal intellectual passivity mattered not one iota, it was in many ways symptomatic of the Israeli people's wishful desire for peace that also, unfortunately, rested on a delusionary foundation rather than on clear thinking.

Premises of the PLO Agreement Erroneous

The premises upon which the agreement with the PLO and some other elements of the Rabin/Peres/Beilin "peace" policy rest are inherently erroneous. I can point to at least three untenable claims made in regard to the Rabin government policy. First, I maintain that the conception that the accord with the PLO is about peace with the Palestinians is distinctly false. Let me explain.

Let's look at the case of the Israeli treaty with Egypt in order to define "peace". The war that had prevailed between Israel and Egypt was a state to state conflict, and the peace treaty signed by those two countries took account of the precise nature of that war, accepting the obligation to end it. It's quite true that subsequently, the peace brought about by the agreement with Sadat is, as they say, a cold peace, with no change in the Nazi-like portrayal of Israel and Jews in the Egyptian media, and where most of the economic benefits (especially from oil sales to Israel) goes to Egypt. Nevertheless, the outcome has provided Israel the requisite conditions of peace, that is, the absence of war. Even that cold peace improved the personal safety and security of Israeli as well as Egyptian people considerably. It's a fact that since that treaty went into effect, not a single Israeli or Egyptian soldier has paid with his/her life by the hands of former enemies.

Now, let's consider what kind of war the Palestinians have always waged against Israel. Did they mount an army and effect air attacks against their Israeli enemy? Was there a specific period of battle that we can document as an outbreak of war with a consequent winner or loser? We all know that's not the case! The war with the Palestinians has always been a terrorist war waged against Israeli citizens, as well as against diaspora Jews. So what's changed? Palestinian terrorist acts still have Jews as their objective, both in Israel and in the diaspora – the Buenos Aires massacre was post-DOP – the tactics are the same although more efficient, and the financing is still essentially from the Moslem world.

Fluidity of Palestinian Loyalties

Nor should anyone think that it is only a small, radical Islamic element that continues the terrorist objectives and operations. Although Hamas and Islamic Jihad have "taken credit" for the various acts of recent murder of Jews, one should not therefore be misled. There's no hard and fast line between Hamas and PLO supporters, or between Hamas and Islamic Jihad, or Islamic Jihad and many branches and participants of the PLO. On November 18, 1994, when there was an outbreak of conflict in Gaza between Arafat's armed men and a good part of the male population of Gaza, some of those Palestinians who were shot by Arafat's police were Fatah supporters, because being Fatah doesn't mean one isn't also Hamas or Islamic Jihad, maybe all at the same time, or maybe at different times. This fluidity of Palestinian loyalties is what Connor Cruise O'Brian, a recognized authority on Palestinian groups and attachments, spoke about on a recent visit to Toronto.

But one does not have to rely on outside expert opinion to appreciate this reality. It is Palestinian spokesmen themselves who inform in this regard. Mr. Zahar, the Hamas leader, said that Arafat's regular practice of setting Palestinian against Palestinian in order to dominate all of them won't work in Gaza. "Here he cannot do this because in every family in Gaza you will find a Hamas adherent, a Fatah adherent and members of other factions – in each family." (New York Times, 3/12/94). A Palestinian leader is quoted as saying, "Hamas is a Palestinian phenomenon. Its membership constitutes a third of the Palestinian population" (New York Times, 8/11/94).

PLO National Covenant Unchanged

Whether it's a third or a quarter or half of the Palestinian population is irrelevant, because the reality is that the promotion of terrorism is hardly identified with Hamas only. Terrorism is still backed by some factions even within the PLO, by Islamic Jihad and even by the PLO's National Covenant which remains unchanged even though Arafat has made a commitment to change it. It's important to understand what that covenant is all about. Over half of its 33 clauses state or imply that Israel shouldn't exist and call for armed struggle. Article 2 defines Palestine as all the land that existed under the British Mandate; article 3 gives only Palestinian Arabs rights to that land; article 7 is about teaching all Palestinian children to be warriors; article 10 requires that commando action should be escalated and expanded, etc., etc. So there's good reason why Arafat hasn't removed what people think wrongly is a single obnoxious clause in the PLO covenant. The whole covenant would have to go if the PLO were serious about peace with Israel.

That there's no support from Arafat's executive committee for ending the traditional kind of PLO war-making is indisputable. Arafat knew when he signed the deal in Washington that the majority of his executive committee, the governing body of the PLO, was opposed to the agreement. Recently (Feb. 22, 1995), a year and a half after the signing, when he finally did call his executive together in order to mount international pressure on Israel, only 9 out of 18 members of the committee appeared for that meeting in Cairo. The rest have either resigned or stayed away out of internal opposition to the "peace" agreement. How much less enthusiasm there is for renouncing the offensive articles in the PLO Covenant is evident by the fact that Arafat hasn't even tried to convene an executive meeting to fulfill his promise to do so. Arafat's failure to act on his promise regarding the PLO Covenant is important because it reflects the true sentiment of the PLO leadership.

And after all is said and done, why should anything have changed? Remember with whom and why the DOP was made! The only reason Arafat came to the bargaining table in the first place was not because he was transformed and now wanted peace with Israel. He came to the table because he had become powerless and was without funds. His blunder at the time of the Gulf War in taking Saddam Hussein's side was so monumental that it left him bereft of support, not only from the US but also from Russia (which has itself lost superpower stature), and most importantly, from those who had been his luxurious meal ticket until then, the rich Arab oil states.

No Peace With The PLO Now Or In The Future

So Rabin and Peres were contracting with someone they knew in advance was unable to deliver. That's why Yossi Beilin, Peres' deputy-minister, told Israelis not to expect that the deal with the PLO would end terrorism. On the contrary, he and other spokesmen for the Rabin government acknowledged that Israelis should be prepared for at least a decade of terror even after this deal is made. This gruesome assurance clearly expressed the Israeli leaders' true appraisal of Arafat's inability to control the Palestinian population of the territories, and worse, that they had no illusions that an improvement in that situation after the transfer of authority to the PLO would occur. And of course it hasn't. Hamas operates openly in Gaza and Arafat's men are either unable or unwilling to void their power and activities. So, there is no peace with the Palestinians and there's no reason to expect that there will be in the near future.

Now we come to the second fallacious assumption that underlies the Rabin government policy. Every pundit and editorial writer spells out the condition for an evolution towards Palestinian peaceful intentions. The conventional wisdom is that peace will unfold with an improvement in the economic condition of the Palestinians, when they then would have a stake in their own future and security. The editorial in the New York Times (28/10/94) puts it this way; "The nations of the Middle East will live in peace only if they escape from squalor".

Unfounded Hope That Economic Well-Being Induces Peaceful Behaviour

Let's assume that such hopeful theorizing is right, that economic well-being induces peaceful behaviour, although I warn you that such reasoning will soon be shown to be wrong. But let's say it's correct. Then it would still require that Arafat and his Tunis cohorts should be effective agents for the economic revival. That simply is not going to happen. As we know, there was a pledge by international financial institutions of $2.4 billion for the PLO, to be disbursed over a five year period. Only about $250 million of that money has actually been transferred to the Palestinian authority. The World Bank holds the PLO responsible for this lack of transfer of capital because Bank officials insist on a system of accountability for the aid funds before disbursing monies. Accountability, however, would obviate PLO leaders' "godfather" method of doling out money, by which loyalties are purchased. It would also mean that Palestinian leaders would be constrained in their past customary luxurious living. A Wall Street Journal story of February 2, 1995, reports on the availability of investment funds for Arafat to revamp the ineffective phone system in the West Bank that has been a source of great annoyance and complaint by Palestinians for years. Yet 17 months after the September 1933 accord that granted Palestinian autonomy to take such economic initiatives, the program has been mired in "confusion, secrecy and apparent ineptitude that have characterized many of Mr. Arafat's economic-development moves since his transformation from the leader of a revolutionary movement to a virtual head of state", to quote the article.

But even if that $2.4 billion were forthcoming, will it bring prosperity? The Middle Eastern and African experience as well as that of other third world countries, does not give one confidence that an injection of money will turn the economy around. Nigeria is a case in point. Billions of petrodollars has not moved it out of the range of a nation with one of the lowest per capita incomes in the world. Saudi Arabia, a country that had a surplus of $150 billion, is today deeply in debt, with rising unemployment, where as many as a quarter of young Saudis are currently unable to find jobs, and where new homes are sitting idle because the state electrical utility can't meet demands for connections. (Wall Street Journal 25/10/94.)

Injection Of Capital Does Not Guarantee Economic Improvement Or Peace

Economists have learned that an injection of capital is far from a guarantee of economic improvement. It depends upon what is done with that capital. If it goes into the elite's consumption, or if it's used for monumental grand exhibitional construction, or if it's put into Swiss bank accounts, it will not induce economic growth. Unproductive uses of capital are endemic in third world countries. The possibilities for economic development depend as well on the rate of population growth. Gaza is known to have one of the highest rates of population growth in the world. In such circumstances, the flow of capital gets dissipated by having to be spread too thin, even if it were to be employed in productive ventures. Many years ago when I studied development economics there was this unshakable faith in the power of capital to transform nations from poverty to wealth. Today that faith is gone. Development economists have learned that this doesn't work. The economies that have in fact succeeded are those like Japan and Taiwan where the work ethic and saving is very strong, not where there is a dependence on outside capital.

This then is the second illusion; that economic betterment is a product of this so-called peace process, and that it should actually be forthcoming. In any case, despite the popular notion that economic amelioration induces peace, or that economic deprivation is the source of violence and war, history and present-day conflicts prove these beliefs to be mistaken. Some of the most economically successful nations and groups make war. Germany had experienced phenomenal economic growth from about the middle of the nineteenth century until 1914, when the Kaiser saw German domination of Europe as its rightful entitlement, beginning thereby the massive slaughter of the first world war. The United States was the greatest economic power in the world when it fought the war in Vietnam because of the "communist menace", as it was then perceived. In our time, Bosnian Serbs actually have much to gain economically by co-operation with other ethnic Bosnians and much to lose through war, yet their nationalism has driven them to violence and destruction in that Balkan region. Where passionate nationalist or other ideology dominate, reason flees into the void; but since economic considerations depend upon reason, there's not much promise for economics to be the generator of peace.

Yet a third mistaken assumption inheres in regard to the Rabin government policy. It is argued by many that even if the Palestinian deal is something less than successful or agreeable, it is the necessary price to pay for Israel to become a respected participant in the Middle Eastern region, economically and politically. Those who hold this view point to the subsequent treaty with Jordan, which followed upon the famous handshake in Washington, as proof of this contention.

Deal With Jordan Does Not Bring Regional Normalization

Undoubtedly, King Hussein of Jordan would not or could not have taken the condemnation from the Arab world and from his own citizens for making peace with Israel, had he not been able to justify his actions on the basis of a prior resolution of the Palestinian issue. Indeed, there were mass protests in Jordan after Hussein's signing, among the intelligentsia at the universities, and among many Palestinians, who currently are organizing the Palestinian Action Committee to oppose the peace treaty. The rally signs and cries in Amman during the signing of the treaty were "kill the Jews". So, Hussein needed a cover in order to transform the de facto recognition that has existed for many years, into a de jure political and economic state to state agreement.

"TOTEMS" BY WALTER REDINGER, 1972.
SAMUEL BRONFMAN HOUSE, MONTREAL

Nevertheless, it is clear by now that the Jordanian concession to make peace with Israel does not translate into regional normalization. On the contrary, the more successful Israel seemed in its contacts with other Arab governments, the more Egypt became determined to pull back such Arab states' interaction with Israel. One might have expected that Egypt, which was isolated and denounced by fellow Arab leaders for making peace with Israel more than two decades ago, would have been vindicated by the recent developments. Instead, Egypt has become apprehensive of Israel's potential influence in the region should it be accepted as an active player in the Middle East. Hence, Egypt has called on those Gulf states which had previously shown signs of moving in the direction of agreement and co-operation with Israel to halt such progress. The facade behind which Egypt and the others now hide in order to reverse the earlier trend is their complaint about Israel's decades-old position on the nuclear non-proliferation treaty. It is a facade because Israel's nuclear position is unchanged from long before Sadat came to Jerusalem. Israel will neither admit nor deny nuclear potential, then or now. The "peace" process then has seemingly brought relations between Israel and Egypt to its lowest point since 1978.

Peace Treaty With Syria Only A Distant Possibility

Meanwhile, the main thrust of the Israeli government's comprehensive objectives, which is to achieve a peace treaty with Syria, has come to a standstill. This despite the well-publicized offer Rabin has made to Syria's Assad to return just about all of the Golan Heights, ("probably indeed all, although [he] will not say so publicly", New York Times, 25/2/95). Perhaps Assad wants more; perhaps money from the US as an "inducement" to make peace; perhaps he's looking to be taken off the US' list of states that sponsor terror; or perhaps he cannot bring himself and his people to renounce their animosity towards Israel and Jews generally. In any case, after three years of talks between Israel and Syria, one can say along with Groucho Marx, "either my watch is broken or the patient is dead." (Clyde Haberman, Ibid.)

At best, the prospects for regional and international normalization remain a distant possibility. But that potential obviously was considered feasible even before the accord with the PLO, or else Israel would not have been able to engage in secret talks with Assad as long as three years ago. Clearly, subsequent developments have not brought those discussions to a successful conclusion. So, one cannot rationalize the deal with the PLO on the grounds of its contribution to achieving a critical breakthrough with Syria. The solution or solutions to the Israeli/Palestinian conflict must be justified on its own merit, which ultimately must be weighed in terms of their contribution to future security, justice, and peace.

Is Rabin Policy Improvement Or Retrogression?

Rabin's and Peres' blunder is that they chose to deal with Arafat because, as they explained again and again, they had concluded that he was the only "available" partner. But they either failed to see or chose to ignore dangerous consequences precisely because of his availability. Arafat's weakness, which made him "available", also now makes the agreement with him unworkable. And, that weakness has serious repercussions to the other claims made on behalf of the DOP. If there is to be an economic turnaround for Gaza, it too will require an effective Palestinian partner to any agreement with Israel. No economic improvement can be expected from a Palestinian leadership that cannot govern. On the Syrian front, Assad would be severely pressed to come round if an agreement with the Palestinians, in conjunction with Jordanian cooperation, had the effect of squeezing Syria out into the cold, cold

Heroes and Valets
Reflections On The Present Zionist Condition

by Emil L. Fackenheim

An Olah had just got her apartment in Tel Aviv when, during the Gulf War, one of Saddam's scud missiles destroyed it. Reporters asked her how she liked Israel. "Just fine," she replied. I was so moved that I told the story in an article entitled "The Heroic Age of the Jewish People."

The Canadian Jewish News published my article but changed its title, into "Why Russian Jews still come to Israel." It must have seemed that heroism applies to Russian Jews and Israel, but not, or no longer to Jews in Canada. And perhaps the analysis was right.

Now, only a few years later, the same phenomenon exists also in Israel. A survey has shown that the heroes of many Israeli youngsters are no longer Zionist pioneers but pop-stars.

Zionist Heroes Being Deconstructed

I do not worry too much about such findings, for the teenagers will grow out of it. What is worrisome, however, is that, when they are just a bit older, there will be, ready for them, "revisionist" historians who are busy deconstructing the heroes of Zionism, so bent on the job as to let nobody escape. These are examples: Herzl had trouble with his family, was narcissistic, and achieved nothing. Israel was born in sin, and Ben Gurion had a big share in it. Yoni Netanyahu, the hero of Entebbe, was a trigger-happy glory-seeker. The list is long. But perhaps worst is Golda Meir, for she somehow stands for Israel as a whole. To be sure, she loved Israel's soldiers, and wept when they died; but her love and her tears were kitsch, and so is everything Israel loves or weeps about. Yad Vashem is kitch. So is the Kotel. So is Massada. Whatever moves Israelis to tears is kitsch, is phony. I suppose that when American Jews are moved by a Christmas tree it is not phoney, simply because they are not Israelis.

There must be some truth in what these historians are saying, for I would hate to think of them as liars. To take just one case, it would be strange if Herzl drove himself as he did and had had no family troubles. But then, as an old saying has it, nobody is a hero for his valet.

"FLEURS SAUVAGES" BY RITA BRIANSKY, MONTREAL

But is he a hero for nobody? Let us make an experiment into historical imagination. There were numerous journalists at the Dreyfus trial. Surely Herzl was not the only Jewish one. Let us assume there were four others. One noticed the antisemitism but ignored it: his job was to cover the trial, not French antisemitism. The second took notice of it but blamed Dreyfus for it: he should not have pushed himself into the exclusive French officer corps. The third thought that since the antisemites thought Dreyfus was guilty, he probably was. And the fourth thought that since antisemites think all Jews are guilty, Jews, himself included, should be blamed for their audacity to survive till the 19th century. The upshot of our experiment? Herzl, and Herzl alone, reacted with the Jewish self-respect the situation demanded, and fifty years later only self-hating Jews failed to recognized it. he achieved nothing? He said he had founded the Jewish state, and he was right. He was narcissistic? He had every right to be. Herzl may be no hero to valets but that, to quote Hegel, is not because he is no hero but because valets are valets.

Ben-Gurion Ignored Pessimism Of Military Experts

Let us take one more example. The UN had voted for a Jewish state, but when the Arabs responded with violence the UN did nothing. Indeed, with the British about to leave, and with six Arab armies poised to strike, the Yishuv leaders were asked to postpone declaring their state, and to accept a temporary UN trusteeship. U.S. Secretary of State General George Marshall, no mean military expert, supported it. British General Bernard ("Monty") Montgomery, no military layman either, but also no admirer of Jewish military prowess, said that "the Arabs would knock the Jews for sixes." And the Yishuv's own military people thought the chances of survival for the state, if they declared it, were just fifty-fifty. However, Ben Gurion and his fellow-leaders listened to the military, but then went ahead and declared the state. The people were dancing in the streets of Tel Aviv that night, but Ben Gurion felt like a mourner at the feast. As he wrote in his diary, he was filled with foreboding.

What would the Jewish condition be like today if they had accepted that trusteeship? For how long? Indefinitely... With what results? Holocaust survivors, dispersed into the four corners of the earth. Russian and Ethiopian Jews, in exile still, abandoned and forgotten. The Yishuv itself, a Ghetto in a hostile world, ever shrinking, and by now virtually extinct. And American Jewry, existing after the Holocaust but without an Israel, so demoralized as to make present Jewish survival problems into child's play – intermarriage, assimilation, childlessness, all the rest. Hitler's ideal of a judenfrei world would be that much closer to realization.

Zionism Itself Is Heroic

Zionism has no heroes? Zionism itself is heroic, and cannot survive otherwise! At present Israel, the Zionist state, is in crisis, and so is world Jewry. Can the crisis be weathered? We must hope and believe that it can and will – unless, to borrow a page from Plato, the valets become the kings of Israel and world Jewry, or their kings, valets.

RABIN'S "PEACE" POLICY

winds of isolation. Therefore, everything that Rabin hoped for in pursuing his "peace" policy depended upon strength not weakness in the negotiator on the other side of the table.

Israel Must Find Alternative To Dealing With Arafat

Those who would have us believe, along with Rabin, that there was no alternative to dealing with Arafat are utterly wrong. Complex conflict resolutions never boil down to one option. There are always alternatives. (This paper is not about alternatives which must be left for another time and place.) The crucial question here is whether the path chosen is an improvement on the status quo or a retrogression. Recent polls in Israel suggest that those earlier sanguine days have passed, and that the majority of Israelis now think that events brought on by the DOP have worsened their lot. They find that Israel is no longer in a position to determine its own operations for controlling the terrorists. It must wait for Arafat to act. They see that Israel cannot choose to close the territories without the implication that this is harming their Palestinian "partner". Thus when Rabin speaks of a divorce between the two peoples, he cannot carry out that strategy, since his policy also locks him into economic responsibility for the Palestinians. In sum, Israelis recognize that they've given up some sovereignty without the compensations they hoped for when the DOP was signed in September 1993.

"SAMUEL BRONFMAN" BY ALAN JARVIS, 1961.
SAMUEL BRONFMAN HOUSE, MONTREAL

"Peace" was what was sold to Israelis, and that's what Israelis thought they bought. Unfortunately "peace" was never possible given the underlying conditions of the Rabin government policy. I'd like to conclude this paper with a comment made by Professor Emil Fackenheim when he spoke in Toronto recently. The professor suggested that Rabin had a golden opportunity that he missed when he went to Stockholm to pick up his peace prize. Instead, said Professor Fackenheim, he should have declined with dignity, informing the Nobel committee that he would be happy to accept the Nobel Peace Prize when peace had come to his people. In that statesmanlike way, Rabin might have acknowledged his citizens' disillusion with the "peace" accord thus far, and shown understanding for their fears. At the same time he would have given notice that alternatives must indeed be sought and acted upon.

Why Ritual?

by Rabbi Dow Marmur

The man belonged to the Temple by subscription only, not by conviction. Whenever he wrote to me about it, he referred to his "membership" in quotation marks. When he died, he wasn't buried as a Jew. None of his children are Jewish. For, to be a Jew, more is required than the formality of Synagogue membership. To belong is, indeed, necessary, but it is not sufficient; in order to be a Jew, I also have to behave like a Jew.

Some may say this man did that. He was highly ethical, very charitable and active in the community at large. He grew up at a time when his Temple considered these to be the only legitimate criteria for Jewish behaviour. But he had learnt that morality, generosity and communal activism are not the sole prerogatives of Jews. If that was all there was to Judaism, he could live "a Jewish life" through the faith of his Christian wife.

Moral conduct and care for others reflect only one side of Jewish behaviour, described in Hebrew as beyn adam lechavero, person to person. Judaism also requires behaviour beyn adam lamakom, between God and person, and that, inescapably, brings us into the realm of ritual. Morality is what we share with all responsible human beings; ritual is what makes us responsive to Jewish tradition. If we want to speak of belonging without quotation marks; if we want to live and die as Jews; if we want to have Jewish children – we cannot confine our behaviour to the inter-personal; for that we also need the supra-personal.

Now the vexing questions: Can I behave if I don't believe? Can I relate to the supra-personal if I don't believe that there is anything above persons? Can I perform religious acts without religious convictions, without belief in God? Isn't this hypocrisy of the worst kind, which we must stay away from at all cost?

Contemporary anthropologists, with no particular religious axe to grind, have taught us that all human activity involves ritual, because ritual is needed to structure time and shape space. And we cannot really exist without either.

Those who are opposed to one set of structures usually embrace another. The man indifferent or hostile to Jewish rituals did not seem to have had any problems in rearing his children in the rituals of the Church, and to be buried with Christian rites. For ritual never leaves us; the question is only which rituals we choose.

Secularists are usually no less ritualistic than those whom they mock. But instead of, for example, spending Saturday sanctifying Shabbat, they spend it at a baseball game – when such things were still available, in the distant past. There, they would adhere to specific dress and distinct headgear: The same people who decry the wearing of kippa in Synagogue as conformist and ritualistic would now proudly don a baseball cap. They would eat special foods, consumed according to an established ritual, at set times. They even like their regular seats, just like regulars in shul.

God And The Queen

None of these faithful men and women would want to describe themselves as believers. Yet, their structured actions are conditioned by the same criteria as in religion, subconscious and immensely powerful. Which brings me to Her Majesty the Queen.

Had the proverbial Martian landed in Canada just before the Commonwealth Games in Victoria, he would have assumed that the Queen, in Canada at the time, was actually ruling the country. The guards of honour, the bowing and scraping, the homage paid to the Sovereign by elected leaders, all suggested that she was actually in charge. But terrestrial beings, familiar with the constitutional monarchy, knew better. We recognized the pomp and circumstance fore what it was: A ritual that brought solemnity to a sporting event, and gave structure and form in a worthy effort to bind a group of very different states, and very different peoples, under the heading, "The Commonwealth." That's what made these Games, like so many other games, such serious business.

The rituals surrounding the monarchy remain very popular. To this day, the vast majority of Canadians want to preserve both the monarchy and its rituals, even though they know that the Queen has no power, and that members of the Royal Family are not the nation's role models. They believe that the monarchy is helping to keep the nation together by bestowing on Canada a structure. Its seemingly silly and outdated rituals give us a framework within which we can express that which proclamations and conventions cannot say.

Religious observance should be considered in a similar light. For the purpose of this article, I am not interested in whether the religious rituals we carry out are commanded by God, as tradition suggests, or have evolved within our culture, as anthropologists would have it. For the sake of this argument, let me concede that there is no reality behind Jewish observance, just as there is no reality behind the rituals of the monarchy. But as it is not hypocritical to maintain the outer forms of the monarchy, so can alleged non-believers be observant without being hypocritical.

Rituals Bind Us To Community And History

Like royal rituals, Jewish rituals bind us to each other in community. Our rituals also link us to our past, to history. By doing what our ancestors did, we bring the ancients into our midst and stand in awe before their unspoken testimony. By handing on these practices to our children, we offer them a structure within which they can confront their Jewish destiny.

Recently, one of the native chiefs in Canada, Gordon Peters, spoke to the press about the plight of aboriginal young men and women. Contrary to popular opinion, he asserted that the root problem of these youths was neither economic nor psychological, but spiritual. They wanted to know their heritage in order to rediscover their history, but there was nobody to teach them. Those who still remembered the old ways had been assimilated, or intimidated by the Christian culture that was imposed on them when they were young. Now, therefore, they were unable to offer guidance.

"MEMORIAL (Detail)" BY MARCELLE FERRON, 1970. SAMUEL BRONFMAN HOUSE, MONTREAL

Because today's native youngsters were ignorant of their history, they had been deprived of community. The rootlessness and the alienation, so the chief said, robbed them of hope, of a sense of common destiny. Hence the high suicide rate among them.

Economic Opportunity Masks Spiritual Void

My fear is that Jews are going the same way. Our economic prosperity and the educational opportunities we give our children mask the spiritual void in which we rear them. But the void is there: Jewish parents and grandparents have been intimidated by the prevailing culture – now not Christian but pagan – to shun the traditional ways that make for Jewish spirituality, as manifest in ritual – with or without belief. We are so afraid of the truth that we often deliberately turn a blind eye to the growing incidents of drunkenness and drug taking among Jewish young men and women. If you don't believe me, talk to those responsible for Jewish camps or trips to Israel; they may tell you a thing or two.

Of course none of us wants to hear such things, let alone believe them. When young Jews behave like the young natives with no commitment to community, no reverence for history and no sense of destiny, we blame schools, shuls, the government – but never ourselves. We consistently fail to see the despair of those whom we have starved spiritually.

The British philosopher Ernest Gellner speaks to all of us when he advocates a religion analogous to the constitutional monarchy. Such a religion, says Gellner, is a sober alternative to the most popular extremist movements in our time – fundamentalism and nihilism. If you are starved of the spirit as manifest in the hallowed rituals of your tradition, you are in danger of ending up either as a fundamentalist in which the minutiae of the law become your obsession and obscure meaning – thus turning ritual into a caricature – or a nihilist in which getting drunk or stoned takes the place of spirituality. Many of us have witnessed at close quarters both these forms of substitution – the fanaticism of the few, and the nihilism of the many. Think, for example, of those close to ourselves who would not come to shul today either because it is too religious, or not frum enough.

Filling The Hollow With The Holy

Jewish behaviour is not handed down from Heaven. It is created by human beings when they choose to act, not in isolation but together as families and communities. Though the stars determine the beginning and end of the Sabbath, we have to make Shabbes for it to be Shabbat. It may start formally with nightfall, but it begins religiously when we make Kiddush, when we sanctify the day through – yes – ritual. The eating without the ritual is only filling my belly. To turn the profane act of ingestion into the holy act of celebration, I need the time-hallowed rituals. And it works even if I consider God no more powerful than Queen Elizabeth II, and religion no more substantive than the monarchy.

Imitatio Dei Sanctifies

The process of sanctification is the Jewish way of imitatio dei, imitating God; through holiness, the presence of the Holy One of Israel can be perceived, even though God cannot be seen or fathomed. God can be imitated even when we are not sure what we believe, or that we believe. In the same way as I can bow or curtsy before the Queen, even when I am uncertain about her role as the Sovereign of Canada, so can I perform acts of imitation of God without being sure about the place of God in the universe, or in my own life.

No, I am not giving up on religion. All I am saying is that even those who do not believe can behave. And those who do not behave as Jews, behave like someone else. There is no escape from symbolism; it is only a question which symbols I choose. To be a Jew, I have to choose Jewish symbols, because just belonging, however fundamental, is insufficient to make me a Jew. To be a Jew, I have to live in Jewish time – not just by celebrating significant events in my own life, but also in the life

Chanukah Presents

by Aviva Ravel

After our father lit the first candle and we had devoured his greasy deep-fried latkehs, Cousin Molly would arrive with a bagful of Hanuka presents. Around mid-October, curled up in our big bed, my sisters and I contemplated our forthcoming gifts late into the night – a stuffed animal for our little brother, a tinker-toy and Chinese Checkers for my younger sisters. When our imaginations soared, we added a circus with tents and lions, a long train with an engine, a life-size Shirley Temple doll; the fully-equipped doll house we had admired on Eaton's fourth floor. As for myself, I hoped for another book; the year before, Cousin Molly brought me The Princess Elizabeth Gift Book, the first book I owned outright. The stories were interspersed with magnificent glossy illustrations of fairy tale characters, pretty rosy-cheeked children romping in flower gardens, and Mickey Mouse, top hat in hand, leading a parade of Disney characters. A portrait of Princess Elizabeth faced the title page, followed by a table of contents listing poems and stories and even a play about a king of France. I guarded the book carefully in my drawer, warning my sisters if they so much as touched the handle, a little man with sharp teeth would pop out and bite off their fingers. After a year the book still looked new, although I had read the stories and poems countless times. I preferred the poems. "They're magical", I explained to my sisters, "like clouds, every time you look at them, you see something different." This year I dared to hope for a whole book of poems, but I admitted I'd be happy with any story book. "With pictures," my youngest sister squealed and slapped her cheeks. I hugged her and experienced the keen, breathless happiness that comes with anticipating something wonderful.

Cousin Molly started bringing Hanuka presents five years before, when I was seven. When our mother told her not to spend her "hard-earned money" on toys, she replied didactically, the faint line between her brows deepening into a crevice. "Other children receive Christmas presents. Our children should not be deprived." The truth is, we never envied the "other children" their holidays or presents; in fact it never occurred to us to compare Hanuka with Christmas. If we were lucky, we got a dime; presents were out of the question what with our mother constantly addressing no one in particular: Where will the rent come from this month? How will we pay the butcher? With what will I buy the children shoes? Secretly, we were glad that Cousin Molly never brought us practical gifts like a scarf, a hat, a sweater, which our mother would have appreciated.

Finally, the interminable wait was over. To our dismay, Hanuka arrived with a heavy snowfall, blustering winds and below zero weather. My sisters and I peered anxiously out the window at the empty street; we threw open the front door and a gust of wind blew in a mountain of snow. Our father shouted from the kitchen, "What's going on there? Close the door! We don't buy coal to heat the outside!"

"The children are waiting for Cousin Molly." Our mother's main occupation in life, apart from looking after her children and sewing in the factory, was to placate our father whose patience generally hovered close to the breaking point.

"We don't need her presents," he said, pounding the table with his palm. Under the bare light bulb, his gleaming bald head, high cheek bones, and pointy ears gave him the appearance of a leprechaun.

"We don't," our mother smiled good-naturedly, and set her hand briefly on his shoulder, "but it makes the children happy."

"Happy-shmappy. Hanuka is not a goyish holiday. The Hashmonayeem didn't fight Antiochus for presents. Soon we'll have trees in the house, with a menorah on top."

Our mother laughed, her light blue eyes twinkling in her tan face. I thought of stars in the early evening. "That's very funny. And we'll hang your latkehs on it, with sour cream and sugar."

"COAT-JARDIN" BY RITA BRIANSKY, MONTREAL

"Don't make jokes. The way Jews are nowadays, don't be surprised if they put pumpkins in the window on Purim, eat matsah on Yom Kippur, and bread on Pesach." He shook his forefinger. "All of you, remember what I said." Pleased with his discourse, he grinned at his children, and treated himself to a long slurp of tea.

We listened to their exchange with rapt interest, relieved that our mother did not side with him on the question of presents. Actually, she rarely agreed with him, and even when she seemed to, she did what she wanted anyway. Our mother rinsed the last supper plate, dried her hands on her apron, and concluded the discussion with, "A few presents aren't going to hurt the children" then she swept into her bedroom to put on a fresh print dress and twist her long black hair into a shiny bun at the nape of her neck.

The two slim candles in the menorah had long burned down to nothing and even the last remnants of smoke had vanished. "Children," our mother said, "the streetcars must be stuck in the snow. It's a bitter cold night. Cousin Molly will come another time. So let's get ready for bed."

"If we had a telephone like Annie, she could call and let us know," I said accusingly in the direction of our father.

My favourite daydream was watching our father, wearing a suit and carrying a briefcase, go off to work in an office, and every week he handed our mother a thick pay envelope. As it was, he worked on and off as a presser, and our mother had to supplement his meagre earnings "we'd be out on the street."

"A telephone!" our father pounded the table again. "That's all we need, ringing in the ears day and night. A telephone is good for a business. A telephone in the house is for fools who have nothing better to do than waste time talking about 'narishkeiten'. The way things are going, people will have two telephones in the house, they'll never read a book, just sit and talk all day."

Our mother winked at us thought to say, never mind him – one day, when we can afford it, we'll also have a telephone.

Just then the doorbell rang. Our little brother looked up curiously from his spoons and pots, and gurgled, his fat cheeks dimpling. I ruffled his fine, blonde curls and cooed joyously. "You'll also get a present!"

At the same time, my sisters cried in unison, "It's Cousin Molly!"

"Who else is it?" our father muttered from the kitchen. "Who else would be so crazy to go out on a night like this?" He rose and tossed a shovelful of coal into the little pot-belly stove he had installed in the dining room. Its pipe extended just below the ceiling across the dining room and connected up through a hole in the wall with the stove pipe in the kitchen. Thus, the flat was warm even on cold, windy nights. In the dining room, a wide extension of the entrance passage, we listened to Jack Benny and The Shadow, did our homework, and had our Shabbos and holiday Meals. Our mother still owed twelve 2-dollar payments on the set, which included an oblong mirror in a gilded frame, six chairs, a buffet, and table.

She moved to the front door and let in Cousin Molly who was covered in snow. She had had to walk three blocks from the streetcar stop. Her breath came in short gasps as she stamped her feet and shook the snow off her hat and gloves.

"Never mind that," our mother said, "Come in in come. On such a night you go out. Look at you. You're frozen. Come in, warm up." Our mother stepped back, and Cousin Molly preceded her, leaving puddles on the oilcloth.

She pulled off her overshoes near the stove, our mother draped her black coat and gloves over a chair to dry and set her black felt hat on the buffet on a towel. Cousin Molly's eyebrows and lashes yielded droplets of water on her pink face; she fumbled for a handkerchief and patted it dry. She bore a striking resemblance to our mother, but every feature was broader and more pronounced. Her short black hair were swept into two kiss-me curls. There were dark grey circles under her eyes I had never noticed before.

"Please have a cup of tea," our mother said, placing the steaming cup before her. And a biscuit. She had bought our favourite chocolate marshmallows, knowing the leftovers would be a treat with our afternoon glass of milk.

Warming her fingers on the cup, Cousin Molly sipped, and downed several biscuits with forced restraint, our mother urging her to have another and yet another, while my sisters and I watched them disappear off the plate. We sat stiffly around the table, our hands clasped together like we were taught at school, as she and our mother talked about boring subjects such as Uncle Getzel's operation and upcoming engagements and weddings. Our father kept himself aloof in the kitchen, his nose in a Hebrew book, and muttered rather audibly, "nochamol veibersheh business", but Cousin Molly either didn't hear or pretended not to. Then she turned to us with a smile that took up half her face, and posed the usual boring questions. What grade are you in now? How are you doing in school? What is your favourite subject? Then commented, with some astonishment, how much we had grown since she saw us last year. We answered politely, nudging each other under the table and trying not to giggle. Our brother grew restless, so our mother excused herself, picked him up off his blanket, and made a move toward the crib in her bedroom. Realizing he was about to be exiled, screamed and kicked his legs. Our mother returned to the table, and set him on her lap.

"Well," Cousin Molly said, "it's getting late, so I better do what I came here to do." She spoke English without an accent, unlike our parents who were born in the "old country".

"I don't know how you'll get home in this weather," our mother said, worriedly.

"I'll be fine, I'm still young," she assured her.

My sisters and I exchanged a meaningful glance. Young, my foot. She wasn't a day under 25.

She bent over, lifted her large bag on to her lap and carefully withdrew gift-wrapped packages. We held our breath, pinching each other under the table. She handed the first present to our baby brother. He quickly ripped off the wrappings and gurgled excitedly at a bright red fire truck, then crawled with the toy from one end of the room to the other, making whooping noises. Cousin Molly was delighted. "That one's a big success." Then she handed an oblong box to our youngest sister unwrapped a "snakes and ladders" game and a colouring book with crayons. She yelped "thank you, than you", jumped to the floor and started colouring. The third gift for our middle sister was a book of paper cut-out dolls and a package of beads for stringing into bracelets and necklaces. She said thank you politely and ran into the kitchen to show our father who was unimpressed. Then Cousin Molly looked at me intently, her wide blue eyes narrowing somewhat. "You're twelve years old now. You're a big girl. So you don't get Hanuka presents anymore."

A sudden hush came over the room. A lump sprang to my throat and the walls began to spin. I gripped the seat of my chair with both hands. I must have turned pale since a look of alarm crossed my mother's face, but she quickly leaned towards Cousin Molly and said, "She understands, of course she understands," then to me, "don't you sweetheart?"

I nodded, sucking breath through my teeth, and feeling my lips tighten into a smile. I stared at Cousin Molly defiantly, holding back tears, and repeated inwardly, don't cry, don't cry, don't cry. Then I slipped off my chair and avoiding the women's faces, feigned great interest in my sister's cut-outs, admiring the pretty clothes and dolls with exaggerated oohs and ahs.

Finally, Cousin Molly rose, thanked our mother for the tea and pressed her cloth coat against her face. "Ah, it's warm and dry," she said, gratefully. "The overshoes too."

"Let me help you," our mother said. "Put on your scarf and pull the hat down over your ears. There. Thank you for the presents." My sisters echoed thank you, thank you. Our father remained unconcerned in the kitchen.

Again my eyes met Cousin Molly's, and I delivered an unnaturally loud goodbye. She started down the passage, our mother following closely behind, cautioning her to walk carefully, not to slip on the ice, then the door opened and shut and she was gone.

Suddenly, my face defrosted and a peculiar sound emerged from my throat. It grew like an approaching train and I couldn't stop it. And with the sound came words of terrible anger, "I hate her. I hate her. I hate her. I'll always hate her!"

My sisters watched helplessly, the older one's face turned crimson, the younger one popped her thumb into her mouth and made loud sucking noises.

"Please, sweetheart, don't cry. She means well. Didn't she bring you a present every year? That nice book… " Our mother reached out to hold me, but I evaded her beckoning arms and stormed into my bedroom, flung myself on our bed and wailed, "I'll never forgive her, never never never. And I'll never talk to her again!"

I heard our father say with considerable satisfaction, "I told you no good would come of her presents."

That was the last time Cousin Molly brought presents. As for me, I never spoke to her again, and on family occasions, I avoided her. Many years later, I had every intention of attending her funeral, but somehow I didn't get there on time.

Our elderly aunt arranged her frail frame in her wheelchair and, hopping aimlessly from one subject to another, lit on Cousin Molly. "She graduated high school, but it was hard times, so she sewed buttons in a factory, and lived by strangers in a room. One year, you were maybe twelve – thirteen, they threw her out because she lost her job and couldn't pay her room and board. But she still brought you Hanuka presents. She had a good heart, now your Uncle Getzel is another story… "

ABELLA

Abella: I'm not sure a Jewish Studies program can do that. I think Jewish studies are very important because they give a respectability to Jewish education and tell Jewish students it's not simply acceptable to get your Jewish education in elementary and high school, but that the universities have now recognized their role in Western civilization, but I don't think that Jewish Studies programs will provide culture, tradition or religion or ideology. They will tell us where Jews fit into Western society, or Eastern society, they will tell us of our place in society, they will allow us to encourage studies of Jewish topics but in terms of providing us with a new religion, well that's certainly not the case.

Viewpoints: So, where does our youth find answers?

Abella: I'm not sure there is such a thing as common ideology. I think what these young people ought to know is what Jewishness means, what Judaism is all about, what Israel is all about, what our history is all about, what Jews have contributed to society.

Viewpoints: Perhaps we could spend a few moments discussing what changes you have noticed during your tenure in the Israel-Canada relationship.

Abella: The Canadian Jewish community is enormously supportive of Israel. I think there is some question about support of the present government as there was support of the previous government, but I think that's acceptable. I think there have been some fundamental changes wrought by the Israelis who want to rethink the role of the Diaspora as do many Diaspora Jews. There are questions the academics and intellectuals are debating all the time. The President of Israel has set up a special blue-ribbon committee to look at the problems, to look at the situation between Israel and the Diaspora and discuss whether the old lobbying and fundraising efforts have to be different. That's something that the Jewish community of the 21st century will deal with.

Viewpoints: Coming to the Canadian scene, what is the present situation regarding Congress' position on the forthcoming referendum? Are they articulating a position, or are they saying "hand's off"?

Abella: No. I hope that Congress will not say "hands off". For the past two administrations, Congress has taken a very strong position on national unity. We've become very involved in the debate. We've formed coalitions with other ethnic groups. We have worked strenuously on the issue of national unity and I hope we take a very strong position. We are a community which is part of Canada, which wants to remain part of Canada, and will do what we can to make sure that Canada stays together. There are some people within the community who may differ from that position, but as an organized Jewish community from coast to coast, Congress will, I hope, retain the position that it's an obligation on the part of our community to fight the battle of national unity, fight it wherever we can… articulate it, write about it, lobby for it, debate, discuss and ultimately play an important role in that ongoing debate. We're Jews, we're Canadians, we're Jewish Canadians, and, as such, we have a role to play in this fight.

Viewpoints: What about the ongoing internal debate as to whether Congress should be involved in "political questions" such as, affirmative action, capital punishment, abortion, gender equality; should we articulate positions on these?

Abella: I don't see those as political questions. I see those as questions of conscience, as social issues, as issues of human rights and civil liberties that Congress has taken positions on in the last ten or fifteen years. We ought to be very much involved in most of these things with the possible exception of abortion – that's a more personal issue – but I think on all the other issues, Congress has taken a very strong position on behalf of those people who feel under attack, those people who feel as if they're being treated unjustly, and Congress ought to take strong positions and has.

Viewpoints: Has a consensus been reached on the question of affirmative action?

Abella: Yes. Employment equity is something that speaks close to my household but it began long before I took over as President. The employment equity and affirmative action position of Congress was approved two administrations ago as a vehicle, a means of helping people who were really oppressed, like the visible minorities, the disabled and aboriginal Canadians.

Viewpoints: What does Congress do if there isn't a consensus on a certain question?

Abella: We have committees who meet in the Regions and discuss the question. They then report to the National Committees and it is only after their decision is made that we take a position.

I think our job is to form a consensus in this manner. And if we can't our job is ultimately to lead. We are the representative body of the Jewish community. We have been its shield, its conscience and its soul for 75 years and should continue in that role.

WHY RITUAL?

of the community, of my people, of the world.

It was once thought that the State of Israel could free its citizens from the burden of belonging and behaving. Having created Jewish space, there would be no need to celebrate Jewish time. In Israel, we thought, you didn't have to belong to a Synagogue, because your Israeli passport was the most convincing badge of your Jewish identity, and you needed no other.

Do Israelis Have To Belong To A Synagogue?

We believed that Israelis didn't need rituals to express themselves as Jews, because all of their public life – and especially military service – made them behave as Jews. By now, though, many Israelis have come to reconsider their position. Having experienced the massive nihilism among the many, and the flight to fundamentalism among the few, they, too, are witnessing growing spiritual despair among the young, even when it appears in the guise of allegiance to some guru in Bengal or Brooklyn. The absence of Jewish behaviour has not brought freedom but a vacuum. As vacuum is impossible in religion, the real thing is soon replaced by a lethal ersatz that hides the void.

If even Israel cannot provide identity without belonging and behaving, what chances do we have here? If Jewishness without holiness is hollow in the Jewish state, how desolate and empty it must be in the Diaspora! None of us, sensitive to the needs of the hour, can be oblivious to that emptiness. None of us, conscious of personal responsibility, can fail to seek a response from the supra-personal. What we need is a little initiative and some determination. Another word for both is teshuvah, return that is repentance; a turning back from the rituals of play to the rituals of prayer.

"WE BEAR WITNESS ETERNALLY"

During a trip to Ukraine last week, U.S. President Bill Clinton paid tribute to the tens of thousands of Jews murdered at Babi Yar by the Nazis. "Here on the edge of this wooded ravine, we bear witness eternally to the consequences of evil," said Clinton, who attended the ceremony with wife Hillary after meeting with leaders of the Kiev Jewish community. [RNS photo]

Accused Nazi back in Canada

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Alleged war criminal Helmut Oberlander has returned to his home in Waterloo, Ont., rather than face a deportation hearing in the United States.

After meeting with Eli Rosenbaum, head of the U.S. Office of Special Investigations (OSI), Oberlander, 71, was placed on the next available commercial flight to Canada from Florida.

Oberlander returned to face an uncertain future. Federal officials here have accused him of lying about his wartime activities when he entered Canada in 1954 and when he applied for citizenship in 1960. He faces possible loss of citizenship and deportation.

The retired home builder is alleged to have participated in the execution of civilians as a member of the SS security service from 1941 to 1943.

Rosenbaum said "under no circumstances will the United States allow itself to become a haven for those who are credibly accused by other governments of complicity in the barbaric crimes of the Nazi regime."

Court documents filed in Toronto last week by the Ministry of Citizenship and Immigration allege that Oberlander served with the German Security Police and Security Service (Sipo and SD), which were part of the SS.

"The Sipo and SD were elite, voluntary organizations, reserved for the most loyal and reliable," the documents state.

Between 1941-43, Oberlander served as an interpreter with Einsatzkommando 10A, a unit of the Einsatzgruppen, used by Sipo and SD as mobile killing squads to murder Jews in German-occupied territory.

He "was armed with a pistol and occasionally had a sub-machine-gun."

The court documents also allege that "as an interpreter, [Oberlander] would have taken part in the interrogation of prisoners of war, persons detained by the unit and other persons suspected of being hostile to German interests. On several occasions, he went on operations with other members of Einstazkommando 10A, equipped with a sub-machine gun. In or about early November 1942, [Oberlander] took part in an action against partisans together with other members of [the unit]...In early 1943, he received a war service medal for his work."

The documents go on to outline a number of mass executions carried out by Einsatzkommando 10A, adding that "members of the unit knew that the killing of Jews and communists was a primary function of the unit."

According to a U.S. newspaper report, Oberlander purchased a condominium in Marco Island, Fla., at least three years ago.

Ronnie Edelman, principal deputy director of the OSI, said Oberlander has been on a U.S. Immigration "watch list" but may have been able to enter the country because his name is spelled differently on the list.

Immigration Canada spokesperson Roger White said there is nothing to prevent Oberlander, a Canadian citizen since 1960, from entering and exiting Canada. "We don't have exit controls," he said. "Until there's a decision made by the court on his status," Oberlander can come and go.

Oberlander left for Florida on the day immigration documents were filed in court.

Hershon wins

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Goldie Hershon was elected the 14th national president of Canadian Jewish Congress, defeating veteran Jewish leader Thomas Hect by a very narrow margin at the Congress Plenary Assembly.

The precise results were not made public but were so close that the Hecht team demanded and received a recount. A total of 848 of about 1,000 eligible votes were cast, said elections chair Stanley Abbey.

Delegate accreditation was a chaotic scene, with Congress officials unable to cope with the flood of organizational delegates who applied at the last minute.

Even those who pre-registered months before had to wait hours to receive their accreditation.

Staff and volunteers were hard-pressed to verify whether applicants were bona fide representatives of the organizations, or indeed whether these organizations had the membership claimed or existed at all. Staff member Shellie Ettinger estimated over 100 were ultimately turned away.

PLO: Don't move U.S. embassy

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service and Jewish Telegraphic Agency

UNITED NATIONS — The Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) on Friday warned of "catastrophic consequences" if the United States moves its embassy from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem.

Referring to legislation introduced by leading Republicans in the U.S. Congress, the United Nations' PLO observer, Nasser al-Kidwa, said: "We want to warn of the catastrophic consequences which these attempts might cause if they are successful."

CANADA

Witnesses Sought

OTTAWA — The War Crimes and Special Investigations section of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police (RCMP) is seeking witnesses who may have direct knowledge of executions committed in Slonim, Tschepilowe and Petrolewizce, all now in Belarus, between July 1941 and August 1942. The executions were carried out by the German SS and local forces.

As well, the unit is seeking individuals who were incarcerated in Pawiak prison in Warsaw between April and August of 1943.

All information is treated in confidence. Contact Cpl. Ken Lavoie at 613-990-8467 or Bernie Farber at 416-635-2883.

Liberal Candidate Dumped

OTTAWA — Ontario's Liberal party last week dumped a provincial election candidate for making what leader Lyn McLeod called derogatory statements about Jews and Catholics.

Mohamed Bassuny was removed as a Liberal candidate in the riding of Carleton because a book he wrote, To Pope With Love, contains "inappropriate and intolerant statements about a number of groups," McLeod said at a news conference.

Bassuny, a native Egyptian, said he will fight the move.

Deniers Evicted

OTTAWA — Two Holocaust deniers who disrupted a free screening of Schindler's List at the Canadian War Museum late last month had to be ejected.

About mid-way through the film, two people stood and shouted that the scenes were a lie and part of a Jewish conspiracy.

The two men put up no resistance when they were asked to leave, except for some insults. Police were called but no charges have been laid.

Sorry, Mr. Laskin

THUNDER BAY — An apology to Saul Laskin, about whom incorrect information appeared in this space last week. Laskin was president of this city's Shaarey Shomayim Congregation and head of the Thunder Bay chapter of the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews.

He is a former mayor of Port Arthur and the first mayor of Thunder Bay. He oversaw Port Arthur's merger with Fort William 25 years ago.

Laskin, 76, will receive an honorary degree from Lakehead University on May 27.

Canadians Among Fellows

TORONTO — Three Canadians are among 21 Jewish communal professionals in North America to have been selected as Fellows for the Council of Jewish Federations' new Executive Development Program.

The two-year program begins in late July in Greensboro, N.C., with an intensive week of leadership assessment, development and planning.

The three Canadians are Danyael Cantor and Maxyne Finkelstein from FEDERATION CJA in Montreal, and Morris Zbar from Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto.

Max Goliger Dies

BURLINGTON, Ont. — Travel pioneer Max Goliger died here May 10 after a lengthy bout with cancer. He was 86.

Goliger fled his native Czechoslovakia and headed to Palestine in 1935. He later worked in Tel Aviv for a Norwegian airline and ran a travel agency in Jerusalem.

He and and his family came to Canada in 1952, and three years later, he started his own agency, Holiday Travel Service, in Montreal.

He and his son Dan later opened branch offices in Toronto and Frobisher Bay.

ISRAEL

Weizman Returns

JERUSALEM — President Ezer Weizman returned last Wednesday from VE-Day celebrations in Moscow, accompanied by 51 immigrants from Russia and the Caucasus regions.

Greeted by Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, Foreign Minister Shimon Peres, MKs and dignitaries, the new immigrants, mostly teenagers, stood in silence during their first few minutes in Israel, as an Army marching band played Hatikva.

Weizman and his wife, Reuma returned from a five-day European tour representing Israel in VE-Day celebrations in London, Paris and Moscow. In the Russian capital, he laid a wreath at the Tomb of the Unknown Soldier.

WORLD

Blast Rocks Shul

RIGA — An explosion May 6 rocked this Latvian city's sole remaining synagogue, one day before the Jewish community marked the 50th anniversary of the end of World War II and the Holocaust.

The bomb exploded in the early hours of Shabbat, shattering the Peitavas Synagogue's glass windows and light fixtures and ruining its basement sanctuary, according to Mordechai Glazman, one of two Lubavitch rabbis at the synagogue. There were no injuries.

Two days later, Latvia's president and prime minister made unscheduled visits to the synagogue and Riga's Jewish cemetery to mark the 50th anniversary.

Arson Hits Shul

LUBECK — A May 7 arson attack against this northern German city's main synagogue came just hours before Berlin's Jewish community rededicated their main synagogue.

An extension to the Lubeck shul was destroyed in the blaze. Nobody was injured, though there were people in the building at the time.

The fire prompted some 2,000 people to gather in Lubeck's streets to protest the attack.

It was the second time in 14 months the synagogue was attacked.

Second Probe Launched

SANTIAGO — At the Jewish community's request, police in the Chilean city of Concepcion have launched a second investigation into an explosion that rocked the Zionist Centre there last month.

The blast occurred the morning of April 16, a few hours after the second Passover seder, and injured the centre's two caretakers.

Police initially concluded that the blast was triggered by a buildup of liquid gas.

Concepcion, about 500 km south of here, has Chile's third largest Jewish community.

Ruling on Priebke

BUENOS AIRES — Jewish groups have welcomed a ruling by an Argentine judge to extradite to Italy former SS officer Erich Priebke, who has admitted to his role in a 1944 massacre of 335 civilians, 75 of them Jews.

Priebke, 81, has lived in Argentina since 1948.

Details finalized in JCC reorganization

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — At $18 million, it's a done deal.

After months of hand-wringing, creditors' meetings and court dates, the Ts have been crossed and the Is have been dotted in the legal paperwork that marks the official reorganization of the Jewish Community Centre (JCC).

The result is the permanent breakup of the JCC's three branches into distinct non-profit corporations, the Bathurst Jewish Centre (BJC), the Bloor Jewish Community Centre (Bloor JCC) and the Valley Tennis and Swim Club (the Valley).

As part of the multi-party transaction, community organizations have gone on the hook for the JCC's debts to the tune of about $18 million.

The Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto led the way: paying the JCC's unsecured creditors in full to a total of $2.25 million (former employees received funds based on a statutory formula); replenishing the JCC's $3.4-million endowment funds; paying Honeywell about $750,000; transferring to the Bank of Montreal (BMO) about $5 million on closing the deal.

In addition, the Bloor JCC took out a mortgage for $3 million, its share of the JCC's bank debt, and the Valley will pay the BMO $1 million.

Earlier, the federation and the community endowment fund advanced about $1.8 million to help pay the JCC's debts. On closing, the federation also arranged a $2.5-million operating line of credit for the BJC.

The federation will launch a special campaign to finance the bailout.

The Bloor JCC and the Valley will be owned and managed by non-profit corporations established by members' groups, while the federation will control a corporation that owns the land and buildings at 4588 Bathurst St. The BJC will be managed by yet another corporation.

In other developments, the BJC has hired a new full-time executive director.

Montreal-born Deborah Pinsky will take over the post in July from Gordon Wolfe, the head of the Jewish Family & Child Service, who is temporarily in charge of BJC operations.

Pinsky is currently the director of Valley Cities Jewish Community Centre, one of six JCCs in the Greater Los Angeles area.

A masters graduate in social work from McGill University, Pinsky began her career as a social worker and director of lifestyles programming at the Snowdon Branch of the Montreal YM-YWHA. She eventually became Snowdon's program director and then moved over to run the Y's Davis branch.

Changing global scene said favoring Israel

By MIRIAM SOBEL
CJN Correspondent

OTTAWA — The dramatically changing global profile of economic and political relations favors Israel, said a political science professor recently.

"You are watching a revolution in world politics the likes of which we have not seen since the Protestant Reformation," Ellen Cannon, a professor at Northeastern Illinois and Roosevelt universities, told an audience at an Israel Bonds dinner.

"The first change is that the economic structure is rapidly changing itself into another form of capitalism, except this time, Israel is in the right place at the right time, in the right century, hitting a home run."

Capitalism is moving away from an emphasis on material goods, she said. The primary product in a restructured world economy is going to be information. And Israel, with its vast intellectual capital, is poised to benefit from this transformation.

Since the collapse of the U.S.S.R., global political organization has shifted from a bipolar model, with the U.S.S.R. and its friends on one side and the United States and all its friends on the other. Instead, Cannon said, we are seeing the emergence of regional powers, such as the European community, with one strong country at the centre. Israel is at the centre of the Middle Eastern regional power, she said.

A riveting storyteller, Cannon peppered her address with personal anecdotes. She told the audience about the only promise her father ever asked her to make. On the day she was to celebrate turning 12 by giving a scholarly talk to the women at her synagogue her father, who had lost his whole family in the Holocaust, gathered her in his tallit and asked that she dedicate her life to remembering the Jewish people. Too young to understand the power of that promise, Cannon says she does now.

"I understand as a mother and I understand as a grandmother and I understand what is facing us ... I understand why every single generation will come together through eternity and teach it to their children, as though we were standing at Sinai for the first time and saying to them, 'This is what we will do, this is what obligation looks like, this is why we have a state, why in a changing world every single Jew has an obligation to keep our people alive.'"

Appropriately, Cannon was speaking to a crowd that had come to honor six women for their outstanding volunteer commitment to Israel and the community they live in. Some have held prominent leadership positions, others have worked quietly in the background for years.

The women being honored were Barbara Solomon-Brown, Goldie Cantor, Vera Gara, Carol Kassie, Lori Loeb and Shelly Schachnow.

Cantor summed up the sentiments of the honorees in her thank you speech. "I am humbled by this tribute and at the same time very thankful. I never saw myself as doing anything out of the ordinary or worthy of this honor, having tried all my life simply to behave in the manner that I saw my parents act and I hope that my children saw in our home."

Cantors help to liven up Yom Ha'atzmaut in Halifax

By JOEL JACOBSON
CJN Maritimes Correspondent

HALIFAX — It may not have had the build-up of a Pavarotti-Domingo-Carreras production, but the three cantors who combined their voices in a recent concert here drew raves for their rich voices and ability to move the audience.

Cantor Stuart Friedman of Beth Israel Synagogue in Halifax appeared with Yair and Arie Subar of Montreal to show more than 300 people how a cantor can lead his congregants in prayer or bring them to their feet with rousing Yiddish and Hebrew folk songs.

The Yom Ha'atzmaut concert was sponsored by the Atlantic Jewish Council and the Jewish Men's Club of Halifax.

Cantor Freidman drew the longest ovation for his reading of Rachel, Quand du Siegneur, an aria from J. F. Halevy's opera La Juive. The Subars' closing medley of folksongs moved the audience to sing and clap.

Atlantic Jewish Council president Larry Freeman said he was pleased for the "opportunity to share our culture and heritage with our non-Jewish friends," who made up more than 30 per cent of the audience.

The Subar brothers, 14 years apart in age, were born into a family of cantors in Jerusalem. Arie is the cantor at Congregation Beth Ora. Yair served in Johannesburg before joining Congregation Beth Tikvah in Montreal six years ago.

"Cantoral singing has been in our blood," Arie said.

Friedman, Baltimore-born and educated, came to Halifax last fall.

"I thought about going into opera," he said, "and even won a two-year scholarship to study in Milan but thought, 'What's a nice Jewish boy doing in opera where you can't perform Friday night or Saturday?' I wanted to serve G-d and being a cantor was a way to combine that with singing."

Proceeds from the concert went to the Metro Halifax Jewish Family Services Fund, to provide for the needy.

Goldenberg: living in the inner sanctum

Scene in Ottawa

By RICHARD CLEROUX

One of the most influential people in the inner sanctum of the Prime Minister's Office is Eddie Goldenberg, an impish-looking, 47-year-old Montreal-trained lawyer who has played a major role in Jean Chretien's political career.

Goldenberg has tremendous power. Everything the Liberal government does in Ottawa — whether it's a new free trade agreement, a slash-and-burn budget or a turbot-war against Spain — must first cross the desk of Edward S. Goldenberg, senior policy advisor to the prime minister.

Chretien and Goldenberg have been politically inseparable for two decades. Goldenberg has done very little else since university but serve Chretien. The pair have developed a relationship based on mutual loyalty and respect that is almost father to son.

"Eddie is one of the few men in Canada who can walk into Chretien's office unannounced, any time he wants to discuss whatever is on his mind," says a senior Liberal who has known both men for a long time. "He's got Chretien's ear, day and night, all the time. It's as simple as that."

Such unlimited access is Goldenberg's reward for having served variously as Chretien's gofer, baggage carrier, devoted aide, political fixer and true believer through thick and thin, good times and bad, for the past 20 years.

The two men complement each other beautifully. Chretien thinks with his heart; Goldenberg thinks with his brains. Chretien is at ease in any crowd; Goldenberg appears awkward in social situations. Chretien enjoys delivering a rousing political speech; Goldenberg enjoys working out a new policy.

Goldenberg's loyalty has never wavered. When Liberal supporters deserted Chretien by the thousands in 1983 in favor of John Turner, Goldenberg stuck by Chretien.

That loyalty has been reciprocated. When the Liberal caucus demanded Goldenberg's head as a scapegoat during the party's hard times in opposition in the early '90s, Chretien refused to give in and kept Goldenberg on his staff.

They've been together in tough times too. When Chretien quit politics temporarily in 1985, he went to work for Lang Michener, where Goldenberg had already opened the firm's Ottawa office, a convenient place for Chretien to hang his hat for a while.

Goldenberg grew up in Montreal, the son of the renowned labor mediator Judge Carl Goldenberg. He went to McGill University where he was a gold medalist undergraduate in economics and political science in 1969. After a year at the Institut des Etudes Politiques in Paris, he returned to McGill and did his master's degree in political science and followed that with a law degree in 1974.

He signed on in 1975 as a special assistant to Chretien, then a cabinet minister in charge of the Treasury Board. He stuck with his newfound hero as Chretien worked his way up the cabinet ladder to minister of industry in 1976 and minister of finance in 1977.

When Chretien made a run at the Liberal leadership in January 1990, Goldenberg was his vice-chair and one of the campaign's top strategists. It came as no surprise that Goldenberg was appointed principal secretary when Chretien became Opposition leader, and then senior policy advisor to the prime minister after the 1993 general election that brought the Liberals to power.

Goldenberg jealously guards his personal life, doesn't give press interviews, and maintains a huge network of life-long friends who make up for the family he has never had because of his 126-hour week. He has never married, although his friends quickly attest that his interest in women has never wavered. He may not make friends easily, but when he does, the relationships last a long time.

His friends appreciate his wry, self-deprecating wit. Told recently that the lights had been burning late in his second floor Langevin Block office, Goldenberg quickly dismissed it: "Yeah, it was the cleaning staff."

Goldenberg is often seen in restaurants about town, sometimes three times a day, and often far into the night discussing complex governmental political theories with his cronies.

Recently Goldenberg was driving to a restaurant with some friends and at least one journalist, when an urgent call came through on the car telephone. It was Chretien wanting to discuss some important government matter.

"Er, this isn't a very good time to be discussing this, sir," replied Goldenberg, and Chretien, surely thinking he had interrupted something else, promptly excused himself and signed off. The car exploded with laughter.

Goldenberg has a secret passion — canoeing. His office walls are lined with photos not of famous politicians, but of himself canoeing on various rivers.

For years he and a group of buddies have tested themselves on some of the most treacherous rivers in Canada. They have canoed on the Nahane, the Petawawa and even scored a first by canoeing on the Ruggles River on Ellesmere Island, less than 400 miles from the North Pole. They had to be rescued by helicopter after the weather turned bad.

"Eddie is powerfully built, especially around the shoulders," says his friend, CTV reporter Craig Oliver. "I've seen him pull a loaded canoe nine miles across open ice. Try that sometimes."

During a canoe trip on a treacherous stretch of the Petawawa, Goldenberg overturned. Oliver caught him floating, nearly unconscious, about to be swept away, and offered to trade Goldenberg's life in return for an on-camera interview. Publicity-shy Goldenberg was adamant — no interview. Oliver saved him anyway.

Burdi sentenced to one year in jail

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Neo-Nazi leader George Burdi has been sentenced to one year in jail for kicking an anti-racist demonstrator in the face during a wild brawl in Ottawa two years ago.

The sentence far outstrips those handed two other white supremacists charged in the May 1993 melee. Their sentences were in the one- to two-month range.

Burdi, 24, is leader of the Canadian branch of the violently racist Church of the Creator and a singer with the music group, RaHoWa (Racial Holy War). He is also a key figure in Detroit-based Resistance Records, which distributes the music of racist rock groups.

"The conviction and sentence make it more difficult for Burdi to operate across the [U.S.] border," said B'nai Brith spokesperson Rubin Friedman.

"A sentence of one year sends out the strongest message possible. Neo-Nazi violence will not be tolerated," said Louis Lenkinski, outgoing chair of community relations for Canadian Jewish Congress.

Police are investigating claims that a U.S.-based Jewish group was responsible for the fire that damaged the downtown Toronto headquarters of neo-Nazi publisher Ernst Zundel.

A man claiming to represent the Jewish Armed Resistance Movement (JARM) called the Toronto Sun and claimed responsibility for the blaze.

But Bernie Farber, director of community relations for Congress, said JARM has long been defunct.

"[It] existed more than 20 years ago and they committed acts of violence in the New York area," Farber said. "But the last they were heard from was 1978. It seems to have been an offshoot of the JDL."

Farber suggested that reference to a long-disbanded extremist Jewish group "could be a ruse to throw people off the track."

Canadian Jewish Congress is playing down the significance of a reputed informant for the Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS) taking up the cause of the white supremacy organization he was attempting to infiltrate.

"Intelligence is a dirty business. Sometimes you win, sometimes you lose," Farber said.

News reports indicate that Luke Desilets was hired one year ago by CSIS to infiltrate the neo-Nazi Aryan Nations. In a recently-released promotional video, Desilets repudiates his former CSIS handlers and says he has adopted the views of the Aryan Nations.

The Security Intelligence Review Committee (SIRC), CSIS' civilian watchdog, is investigating.

But Farber said Desilets appears to be a minor player.

Parents' strength an inspiration

Just one month ago, Alisa Flatow, a Brandeis student studying in Israel, lost her life on an Egged bus in Gaza. She was mortally wounded when a piece of shrapnel pierced her brain. Still at the height of their grief, her parents decided to donate her organs to needy Israelis. At least six people were helped. Unfortunately, two have since died.

We commented at that time on the remarkable strength of character and profoundly immeasurable generosity they displayed.

Alisa was 20 years old when she was killed, bright, energetic, lovely, in the early flower of life and loved by many. Like all victims of terror, her life was ended cruelly by crazed, cowardly people filled with hate.

We mourn all such victims. Each life taken was precious and irreplaceable, lost forever to their families, to their people and to the world.

But Alisa's death sent an additional shiver through Diaspora hearts. She could have been the child — studying, touring or simply visiting — of any one of us. In a certain sense she was.

Indeed, we remember just a few years ago, how a beautiful, young Toronto girl, Marnie Kimelman, lost her life on a beach in Tel Aviv, also a victim of the terrorists' cowardly hatred and random murder. Her parents understand in a way most of us cannot the true depth of the Flatows' suffering and the true dimension of their courageous response.

Sensing this shiver, Rosalyn and Stephen Flatow, Alisa's parents, have again responded poignantly in a moving attempt to ease it. They are establishing a foundation in Alisa's memory that will assist students from the Diaspora to pursue their religious studies in Israel.

In a letter to the editor of the Jewish Week of New York published on May 5, Mr. and Mrs. Flatow explained their reasons.

"Alisa would not want anyone, especially students, to distance themselves from Israel. Because we believe so strongly in the need for Jewish youth to study in Israel, we have established the Alisa Flatow Memorial Fund for the purpose of providing scholarships on a need and scholarship basis to young men and women to study at Yeshivas in Israel."

Speaking to the Jewish Week, Mr. Flatow elaborated. "If someone were to call me up, I would tell them that they have to send their kids to Israel, otherwise the terrorists win."

We must all take heart from the strength of these remarkable individuals and be inspired by their example, and above all, we must pledge never to let terrorists win.

Polish Congress replies to Rabbi Bulka

I am writing in response to the charge made by Rabbi Reuven P. Bulka in your May 11 issue, that Poland is "so steeped in anti-Semitism that it eagerly cooperated with the Nazis in the cold-blooded murder of Jews."

Leading Holocaust historians such as Raul Hilberg, Yisrael Gutman and Szymon Datner have addressed this issue so I need not offer my own historical assessment.

Gutman, the director of research at the Yad Vashem Institute and editor-in-chief of the authoritative Encyclopedia of the Holocaust has stated: "All accusations against the Poles that they are responsible for the 'Final Solution' are not even worth mentioning. Secondly, there is no validity at all in the contention that Polish attitudes were the reason for the siting of the death camps in Poland." And again: "I want to be unequivocal about this. When it is said that Poles supposedly took part in the extermination of the Jews on the side of the Germans, that is not true. It has no foundation." Datner, longtime director of the Warsaw Jewish Historical Institute, has been equally blunt: "Poles are not responsible for the crimes of the Holocaust."

Given the choice between these scholars, who have spent decades studying and researching the subject, and the bald claim of Rabbi Bulka, no reasonable person would hesitate in rejecting the latter and recognizing it for what it is: profound ignorance.

While clergymen need not be good historians, one would think that before they took pen in hand they would stop to think whether or not they are bearing false witness against their neighbors, even though they be Christians.

Attempts to save Jews of Hungary and Slovakia

Yehuda Bauer's book: Jews for Sale (Yale University Press 1994) is a masterful analysis of the heroic attempts of Jews to save other Jews during the Holocaust.

Sheldon Kirshner's review of the book (CJN, April 20) requires a few comments: The efforts of Joel Brand, Rezsoe Kasztner, Otto Komoly and others cannot be called a failure. Apart from the Bergen-Belsen train, an additional 20,000 Jews were shipped to Austria. About 12,000 survived. An "action" was planned by the SS on Aug. 25, 1944 to deport the Jews of Budapest to Auschwitz. It never took place. The negotiations between Kasztner and others with the SS leaders "were the direct cause of the rescue of the Jews of Budapest" (p. 221).

Heroic gentiles such as Raoul Wallenberg and the Swiss envoy Charles Lutz saved thousands of lives. Wallenberg gave his own life as well — to save Jews from death. But the initiative of the Jewish leaders who tried to save as many lives as they could must not be forgotten. Many paid with their own lives.

Kirshner writes that "under German pressure, the Slovakians agreed to the deportation of the Jewish citizens." In actual fact, the first Slovak republic, whose president was a prelate, was the first National Socialist puppet state to cooperate with the mass murderers with great enthusiasm. There was no pressure. It was the Slovaks, not the Germans, who initiated the deportations.

Slovakia was unique in another respect: it was the only Axis State which agreed to pay the Germans (RM 500) per person, in return for permission to keep the property of those whom they sent to be killed and an assurance that these Jews would never return. A total of 75,000 out of 90,000 Slovakian Jews were murdered.

Applauds Third Seder for HIV victims

The Jewish community owes the Holy Blossom Temple and the other reform synagogues in Toronto much gratitude and they, in turn, deserve our keen admiration for their sensitivity and moral courage in organizing a Third Seder for HIV victims here.

Although compassion and g'milut chesed for our less fortunate brethren have long been Jewish civic virtues, traditional Judaism has had much difficulty accommodating itself to the complexities of the human condition, particularly when they appear to offend our preconceptions of acceptable forms of sexual conduct.

Let's hope the other synagogues will put aside their misgivings and reservations and that they will wholeheartedly join the reform synagogues next year in sponsoring this manifestation of solidarity and humanity with our tragically afflicted co-religionists.

3,800 Polish Jewish soldiers gave lives

Janice Rosen in her laudable article "Significant Jewish presence in military" (CJN May 4) mentions the 63 Jews of the "First Polish Amoured Division-First Canadian Army" who gave their lives on the battle fields of France, Belgium, Holland and Germany.

This story would not be complete without drawing attention to the fact that the above represents the participation in the Canadian Armed Forces only.

More than 3,800 Polish Jewish soldiers were killed in action in all theatres of war where the Polish armies fought. That figure includes the more than 600 Jewish officers murdered by the Soviet NKVD in the Katyn forests.

It would be amiss not to pay tribute to the 24 gallant Jewish pilots of the Polish Air Force who sacrificed their lives during the Battle of Britain.

All these valiant soldiers, together with their brothers and sisters, the ghetto fighters and partisans gave their lives for Am Israel.

Lag b'Omer: plagued by mystery

By MARTIN I. LOCKSHIN

To some people, Lag b'Omer means a school outing to the forest with a bow and arrows or a field day of sports activities. To other people it is a Jewish Guy Fawkes Day, when children light fires in unlikely locations and parents pretend to be unconcerned. To thousands of Israelis, it means a pilgrimage to the usually sleepy Galilee town of Meron. To historians, Lag b'Omer is a riddle that perhaps will never be totally understood.

Lag b'Omer, literally the 33rd day of the Omer, is celebrated in different ways by different Jews, but it is always seen as a happy day. The rest of the Omer — the period of 50 days that separates Pesach and Shavuot — has, on the other hand, been seen by Jewish tradition as a time of mourning and sadness. Neither the origin of the sadness of the Omer nor the origin of the happiness of Lag b'Omer is totally agreed upon.

There is not the slightest hint in the Bible or in the Talmud that the Omer should be a period of mourning. In biblical times, the Omer was probably a time of happiness, when the grain harvest in Israel was at its height and the weather in Israel was (and is) ideal.

Then, a little over 1,000 years ago, we see in texts that Jews were relating to the Omer as a time of sadness and of deprivation. Yet even these earliest texts reflect puzzlement about how and why the Omer restrictions came into place.

Some medieval authorities saw the reason as mystical. They suggested that punishment of the wicked after death takes place from Pesach to Shavuot. For others, the restrictions of Omer were seen as commemorating the events of medieval Ashkenazi history. Many of the atrocities of the Crusaders against the Jews of Europe, beginning in the year 1096, were committed during the early spring, i.e., during the days of the Omer.

But the most common explanation of the origin of the Omer restrictions is that they commemorate some sad event in Jewish history from a much earlier period, the times just before and just after the destruction of the Temple in the year 70 CE. The most popular rabbinical explanation says the Omer restrictions commemorate the "plague" that caused the deaths of 24,000 students of Rabbi Akiva, deaths that the Talmud teaches us took place between Pesach and Shavuot.

It is possible this "plague" is actually a reference to the persecutions by the Roman emperor Hadrian, who outlawed many Jewish practices, including the study of Torah, after crushing the Bar Kochba revolt (130-132 CE). The persecutions of rabbis in this period are well-documented in the Talmud and other sources.

Attempting to repel the Romans. [Bar-Kokhba, Widenfeld and Nicholson, 1971]

So why is one day of the Omer, Lag b'Omer, a happy one? Again, so many different answers have been offered that we must conclude no one really knows for sure.

The most common medieval explanation (with scant support in the Talmud) is that the plague that affected Rabbi Akiva's students stopped on the 33rd day of Omer. But a number of other explanations connect Lag b'Omer to other events in the first or second centuries.

Many historians have connected Lag b'Omer to some form of Jewish rebellion against the Romans. The Jewish historian Josephus tells a story of an organized Jewish rebellion in Jerusalem against the Roman governor Florus in May of the year 66 CE. The Jews pelted the Romans with stones thrown from above and successfully put off a plan to despoil the Temple in order to collect a new punitive tax from the Jews.

Josephus gives us a precise date for that event that corresponds to the 17th of Iyar on the Jewish calendar, i.e., the 32nd day of the Omer. (Could one speculate that the Jews might then have celebrated their victory — following the pattern of Purim — on the day following the conflict, the 33rd day of the Omer?)

An alternate and even more speculative theory suggests Lag b'Omer might be a commemoration of some early and successful event in the Bar Kochba revolt. The advantage of these two last explanations is that they provide some good reason for its connection between Lag b'Omer and weapons like bows and arrows (not a common element of any other Jewish celebration).

Another set of explanations tries to connect Lag b'Omer to some event in the life of one of Rabbi Akiva's greatest students, Rabbi Shimon bar Yohai. Some say Lag b'Omer commemorates his death; others say Rabbi Shimon bar Yohai was married on Lag b'Omer, and yet others say he was ordained a rabbi on that day.

With so many different explanations, is there anything we can say for certain about Lag b'Omer?

We can note that Lag b'Omer is almost always connected to the theme of opposition to tyranny. Rabbi Shimon bar Yohai was one of the rabbis who spoke out most strongly against the Roman regime in the Holy Land. The Talmud says he is the rabbi who, not surprisingly, had to hide from the Romans for many years and live in caves in order to stay alive and continue to study Torah.

The theme of standing up against tyrants remains timely even today, but one other theme common to many explanations about Lag b'Omer deserves mention.

Classical sources often see the custom of taking bows and arrows and going off into the forest as commemorating the way Jews in the second century had to camouflage the fact they were going to study Torah — by pretending they were going hunting.

While today, thank God, we have no need to hide our Torah gatherings, I still think one might learn from Lag b'Omer that there are many venues and many ways to study Torah. If a trip to the forest with a bow and arrow can be turned into a Torah session, so can many other modern things — like sessions on the Internet or interactive games. Different props might be used at different times, but Jewish learning can and must adapt to new settings.

Tragic lesson of Rabbi Akiva's students

By GARY ROSENBLATT

The Jewish calendar is filled with memories, particularly this month; dates and reminders echo our collective past. Our task is not only to mark the dates but also to consider how best to honor their message.

Within the span of a week, we observed Holocaust memorial day, Israel's memorial day for its fallen soldiers and Independence Day. Indeed, the experience of modern Israel, its pain and joy, seems crammed into a 24-hour period which begins with a solemn observance for those who died defending the country and culminate with the free-spirited excitement of Independence Day celebrations.

We are also in the midst of a seven-week period during which, each night, we recite a blessing and count the Omer (an offering brought to the Temple during Passover, and thus the name of the period between Passover and Shavuot). It is a time of anticipation, when the Jewish people engage in a collective countdown in recalling their date with destiny. They were told that on Shavuot, at Mount Sinai, they were to receive God's gift, the Torah. We try to relive that excitement by counting down the days to Shavuot.

But the Omer is also a time of semi-mourning, for reasons that have become obscured over time. Marriages are prohibited during this period, as are haircuts and enjoying music. The one exception is Lag b'Omer (the 33rd day of the Omer). Legend has it that thousands of students of Rabbi Akiva died of a plague during the period between Passover and Shavuot, and that the 33rd day of the Omer was the only day there were no deaths.

According to the Talmud, the students died because they did not treat each other with respect.

What a powerful lesson for us today, at a time when the denominational wars among Orthodox, Conservative, Reform and Reconstructionist Jews are increasing, and when critics and supporters of the Rabin government's peace efforts are at each other's throats.

One common characteristic of those engaged in the rhetoric wars is a sense of certainty about one's own position and a lack of respect for one's opponent. Some observant Jews have no tolerance for those who they insist are destroying the faith of their forefathers; some liberal Jews have contempt for those who they maintain are practising a form of primitive tribalism.

Here and in Israel, some critics of the Rabin government charge the prime minister and Shimon Peres, the foreign minister, with being traitors, destroying the Jewish State by giving away its sacred land and abandoning its values. Some supporters of the government say the critics are fanatics and racists who refuse to recognize the reality of an Arab population.

How are we to respond to this cacophony of cat-calling? Perhaps the same way Israel marks Yom Hazikaron, the memorial day for the soldiers and others who fell in Israel's wars. On that day each year, at a precise moment, a piercing siren wails its warning and then there is a moment of national silence.

It would do us as a community good to accommodate a bit more silence in our lives. Not the silence of emptiness, but that of reflection.

Too often, our communal and religious leaders feel the need to respond to every event and crisis of the day with a statement, a policy position, a media alert. Fax machines never rest, the phones are always busy. Some of the statements are eloquent, a few of the positions are thoughtful. But not enough to warrant all the time, energy and expense.

Rabbis and their religious movements seem to have more to say about political issues than spiritual ones. We know where they stand on social service bills, but what advice do they have for us on matters of faith in a world gone mad with violence and terrorism?

We know organizations' positions on Israel's foreign policy where their input is marginal, but hear little on how to deal with Israel's religious, moral and ethical conflicts — areas where their advice could prove constructive.

Closer to home, our Jewish leaders and representatives have far more to say about matters of political legislation than personal loneliness, more about communal resources than covenantal responsibilities, more about funding then feelings.

In a society geared toward the quick fix, we need to pause and take time to address the deeper questions, even if — or precisely because — they do not lend themselves to glib answers.

The Talmud says that if a word is worth one shekel, silence is worth two. There is a time to speak out, of course, but we need to make time to listen to each other, and think before reacting, or we will not have learned the tragic lesson of Rabbi Akiva's students.

Celebrating VE-Day in D.C.

I thought I knew all about the war I had helped to fight 50 years ago. Still, when the invitation came to participate in the anniversary celebrations in Washington on May 8, I accepted with an alacrity which surprised me. This was evidently something I very much wanted to be part of.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut

The morning ceremonies are fresh in my mind and heart. In Toronto, on the way back from the airport, I heard about the Canadian and British observances, and the replays of the joy, relief and gratitude which victory had evoked in 1945: the dancing in the streets, the ticker tapes painting the sky white with fluttering streams of happiness.

The morning was far more sober. We started at the U.S. Holocaust Museum, sitting (shivering, I might add) in Eisenhower Plaza where 900 invited guests were assembled. It was my privilege to lead off with reflections and prayer. (I think I was invited to Washington because I was a refugee from the Nazis who was also fated to be among the liberators.) I repeated the words of Torah, "I have set before you life and death. Therefore choose life, so that you and your offspring may live" — words inscribed on the walls of the plaza.

Since those days long ago, I have become somewhat inured to stories of terror and death; but what I heard today seemed different. Survivors, a general and a nurse were among the speakers. Each had a different and often deeply stirring tale to tell. Famed author Samuel Pisar gave the keynote address. He told a transfixed audience how he, an emaciated boy of 15, with years at Auschwitz and other camps behind him, had fled from Dachau during the last days of the war. He encountered an army tank which he thought was German and was sure that death was a certainty. But then he saw it: the white star painted on the side of the metal monster, speaking of freedom.

A black soldier peered out and did not know what to make of the crouching, emaciated boy. Was he one of the youngsters the Nazis had drafted into the army, who might wait for the chance of delivering a mortal blow to the enemy? Carefully the American approached Sam who, knowing no English, fell down and kissed his feet, speaking the only words he knew: "God bless America!" The soldier picked him up, cradled him in his arms and made him ride the tank with him. Pisar managed to tell it in a way that held one breathless — and I was not surprised that later, President Bill Clinton repeated the story in his speech.

I am not a worshipper of flags, and while a presentation of colors elicits my respect, my emotions remain untouched. Not so today. When the U.S. Armed Forces' special unit presented the flags of the divisions which had participated in liberating the camps I sat there, strangely spellbound, waiting for the banner of my 104th Infantry. Then it came: the green-and-white Timberwolves insignia waving in the wind. Suddenly, my heart jumped into my throat. I was transported back to VE-Day 1945, when I had last seen the flag. Tears of gratitude had come to my eyes then, and they did so again. War is so complex, and so is memory.

I found William Perry, the U.S. secretary of defence, a most impressive man — simple, yet forceful. What I remember especially of his speech were his opening and his final words. He started with a quotation from W. H. Auden and ended with a line from Aeschylus. Somehow, I had not expected poetry from the secretary, and I was taken by the spirit he evoked. It was that kind of mood.

I briefly met Gen. John M. Shalikashvili, a child of a Georgian (south Russian) family. The end of the war found the 9-year-old boy in Germany. Today, he is the chair of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the highest ranking officer in the United States.

When I checked in at Dulles Airport for my flight home, the man behind the counter saw my VE-Day button. He asked me, "Were you there, back then?" I nodded agreement. "God bless you," he said quite simply and pressed my hand.

The Jewish TV universe

Remember the good old days, when all that Canadians could receive on their television sets were the CBC and a few fuzzy images from Seattle/Buffalo/Vermont.

By Allan Gould

And now — who would have guessed it? — there's a channel dedicated totally to women; another to science; several others to arts, or sports, or recent movies, or lousy movies of the '60s and '70s, which you were wise enough to miss when they first hit the movie houses, but for some reason are supposed to be thrilled to view today.

Every other day, our newspapers talk ecstatically about "The 500 Channel Universe!" — as if this is something to be hopeful about. Well, if we really are moving rapidly toward this overwhelming number of choices for our rapidly-decreasing free time, how about a Jewish 500-channel universe?

The Shacharit Channel. Runs mornings only.

The Mincha/Ma'ariv Channel. Two new channels, originally begun separately, but soon merged. Rabbis will argue for years over whether viewers at home may be considered as part of the minyan.

The Birkat Hamazon Channel. It is recommended that viewers simply flip it on, after each meal or whenever they partake of bread. Companies which produce food eagerly buy commercials on this one.

The Mezuzah Channel. A TV channel entirely dedicated to the mezuzah: How to put it up; which prayers to say; how high or low on the doorway; how to check it for flaws, and so on. Kiss this one goodbye.

Channel surfing par excellence

The Unleavened Channel: This one will be available only for the month leading up to Passover each year. How to dispose of leaven; kashering utensils; quizzes on forbidden foods; who to invite — and not to invite — to your seder.

The Yom Kippur Channel. Will be nicknamed "The non-cooking channel" or The Fasting Channel." A bit of a downer, but still hopeful. Loved Kol Nidre, though.

The Shofar Channel. How to make a shofar; how to blow a shofar; how to hire a chauffeur, and more.

The Divorce Channel provides all that you need to know about a Jewish Get, but couldn't afford to ask. Viewers are urged to watch this one for several months before tuning in to …

The Marriage Channel. Mazel Tov!

The Tzedakah Channel. It had to happen: 24 hours a day of fundraising. I, personally, gave at the TV.

The Kabbalah Channel keeps changing its number on the cable, as it finds new and different meanings of each number.

And, need I mention The Kvetch Channel. Oy, what a channel! Feh!

Politics threatens peace process

Dr. Henry Kissinger once said that Israel had no foreign policy, only internal politics. He was not exaggerating, though Israel is not much different from other democracies, where governments hesitate to act resolutely and in the long-term national interest, if the latter appears to clash with public expectations.

By Yeshayahu Nir

There were times when this country's politics were guided by David Ben Gurion's known principle that "one does not ask the people what it wants, one does what the people needs." Menachem Begin acted so when the peace treaty with Egypt required the evacuation of all Israeli settlements in northern Sinai, a sacrifice for which the country was unprepared. When Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin signed the agreement with the PLO, he too indicated similar intentions, but later his resolve started to falter.

The implementation of the agreement with the Palestinians is now so far behind schedule that its future is uncertain. But those who insist that Islamic terror is the single cause of the present impasse are unwittingly conceding that Hamas and the Islamic Jihad have won the battle against peace, which is not true.

In fact, the PLO and Israel bear a greater responsibility for the near deadlock. Although both sides repeatedly proclaim their unwavering determination to continue the peace process, they tend to do so only half-heartedly and want their constituencies to register their reticence.

First, the PLO hesitated to fight the Islamic extremists for fear of unleashing a Palestinian civil war. Israel responded by closing down the Gaza Strip, inflicting unbearable collective punishment on all its inhabitants. Then, when Chairman Yasser Arafat learned the lesson and started a more effective campaign against the Islamic extremists and probably foiled more than one planned terrorist attack, Israel did not respond by relaxing the siege. While the appearance of Rabin's toughness may have temporarily helped him stabilize his internal position, Arafat's clout within his own constituency has been severely compromised.

The gradual phasing out of tens of thousands of Gaza workers from the Israeli economy may have somewhat limited the ability of would-be terrorists to infiltrate the Green Line, though certainly not eliminated the threat, but the massive unemployment created in the autonomy by these measures is deepening the existent misery and frustration and could well cause a dangerous popular explosion that could mark the end of Arafat's rule there, with incalculable repercussions on Israel's military control of the Jewish settlements in the area and beyond.

As the ailing peace process with the PLO was limping from one obstacle to another and representatives of both sides continued to meet and even to make some modest progress, Israel decided to expropriate more land in eastern Jerusalem for new housing projects. Though Israel's firm stand on Jerusalem is well known and enjoys the widest consensus in Israeli public opinion, the announcement at this particular time revealed an astonishing lack of sensibility and provided the Arab world, including the most moderate countries such as Jordan and Morocco, with the predictable and irresistible urge to unite against the plan and to demand that it should be rescinded. The delicate issue of the future of Jerusalem, which according to the original Israel-PLO agreement is to be discussed only a year from now, would have been better left alone, for many reasons.

Nor is it clear if the Israeli position on the future status of its capital was seriously enhanced by the recent motion of the U.S. Senate — sponsored by 97 out of 100 senators — to move the American Embassy from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem in 1999. Appreciated as it must be by Israelis — as was a similar undertaking by former prime minister Joe Clark of Canada in 1979 — it had here and there the imprint of internal politics. Hopefully the American resolution will experience a different fate than its Ottawa precedent.

All these developments prove how vulnerable the peace process is to excessive limelight and populist politics, and how dependent it is on confidential and unreported contacts. If Rabin and Arafat continue to be captives of their own rhetoric directed at public consumption, they will accomplish little for their two peoples, whose destiny is to live side by side whether they like it or not. If Israeli internal politics, intensified by the first salvos of the electoral campaign, induces Rabin to choose hawkish tunes and actions to help his re-election in 1996, he could well be surprised by the voters.

For if the voters do opt for an intransigent leadership, they will most likely turn to Likud, the original, and not to Labor as a duplicate. Even the Arab side could reach the same conclusion. One of PLO's most eloquent spokesmen, Nabil Sha'at, said recently: "Maybe we Palestinians should prefer a Likud government in Israel which can deliver, with Labor in opposition supporting." He too was fueling the internal debate here, which has so far scored some points, but not meaningful results.

Apostle of the radical right

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

The recent terrorist bombing in Oklahoma City has focused renewed attention on the radical right-wing fringe in the United States. In this article, Sheldon Kirshner looks at one of its chief proponents.

Several years ago, David Duke astonished observers by winning a seat in Louisiana's legislature, thus becoming the first former grand wizard of the Ku Klux Klan to be elected to public office in the United States.

Duke's victory prompts two questions. Is he on the cutting edge of a radical change in American politics? Or is he merely an insipid, insignificant blip on the screen?

Duke's ascendancy from obscure racist to national celebrity has sowed fear and uncertainty in many quarters. For if Duke is indeed representative of a new wave of racist politicians on the American scene, Jews, blacks and other minorities should be worried.

Duke, after all, may run for the U.S. Senate. He may even have his sights set on the White House. It's extremely unlikely that someone of his ilk will actually become president. But who in the 1920s or early 1930s could ever have imagined that Germany — an advanced, civilized nation — would be governed by a failed artist named Adolf Hitler? The analogy is limited, of course, but complacency is not what is needed in the wake of Duke's success at the polls.

Although Duke has become something of a phenomenon, given the reams of free publicity he has generated, the man behind the headlines remains relatively elusive and unknown.

So who is the real David Duke?

The answer, or a good part of it, is found in Michael Zatarain's interesting biography, David Duke, Evolution of a Klansman (Pelican Publishing, $21.95 US).

A New Orleans consultant, Zatarain is clearly fascinated and repelled by his subject. He credits Duke with being "smooth, well dressed, totally dedicated and obviously intelligent." Yet he abhors his racism and ultimately pities him because he is squandering his talents in the service of bizarre and detestable policies.

Duke was born in Tulsa, Oklahoma, on July 1, 1950, the son of a U.S. army officer who raised him in a strict, conservative, Christian home, and who instilled in him a love of reading.

Originally sympathetic to the plight of blacks, and outspoken in favor of the civil rights movement, Duke switched course after attending a meeting of the White Citizens' Council, a racist organization formed in the mid-1950s to fight integration.

Duke read its literature and, though not converted, "began an intellectual odyssey into the other side of the race issue," as he put it. Interestingly enough, Barry Goldwater, the 1964 Republican candidate for the U.S. presidency, was Duke's first "political hero."

By 1967, Duke had become an unmitigated racist. He joined the Knights of the Ku Klux Klan around the time he enrolled at Louisiana State University.

On campus, he delved into the Jewish question, which intrigued him. He convinced himself that Jews were soft on communism, that they controlled the media and that their support of integration was nothing more than a ploy to "settle an old score with the gentiles."

Zatarain writes that Duke's anti-Semitism hardened after he came under the influence of a maverick Catholic priest associated with the White Citizens' Council. This malevolent person, Lawrence Toups, argued that Jews were subverting Christianity and the Western world.

But even as he drank from Toups' poisoned cup, Duke, in deference to his father and his Jewish relatives, temporarily kept his anti-Semitic opinions in check.

As Zatarain tells it, Duke's most extreme period was between 1969 and 1970, when he spouted Nazi ideology and was partial to the National Socialist Liberation Front (NSLF). During a visit of left-wing lawyer and anti-Vietnam war activist William Kunstler to Tulane University, Duke dressed up in a classic Nazi uniform and carried a sign that read "Kunstler is a communist Jew."

The following day, Duke's picture appeared in a New Orleans newspaper, a photograph that indelibly stamped him as a racist par excellence. Duke insisted he was a "racialist," someone who took pride in his white heritage. But the die was cast.

Duke's father, an anti-Nazi, rebuked his son. As a result, Duke publicly distanced himself from the NSLF. Nevertheless, he continued to support groups such as the Nazis, the Klan and the John Birch Society. In addition, he joined the White Student Alliance, which had close links with extremists.

In 1975, he plunged into electoral politics, contesting a legislative seat in Baton Rouge, the state capital. He never mentioned the Klan in any of his campaign literature, but made no attempt to conceal his racist views. Duke was soundly thrashed, but he picked up a third of the vote.

Four years later, Duke took aim at the state senate, but without success. Shortly afterward, he left the Klan to found his own organization, the National Association for the Advancement of White People, formed along the lines of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. Duke believes that Caucasians are the real minority on earth and that they need someone to protect their interests and heritage.

By that point, Duke was an unreconstructed Holocaust denier, Zatarain suggests.

Duke acknowledges that atrocities were committed against Jews during World War II. But he claims that the Holocaust is a weapon in the Zionist movement's armory. As he noted in a newspaper piece:

"The Holocaust is the rock upon which Israel rests. Chronic Holocaust propaganda was the main justification used in the expropriation of Palestinian land to make way for the Jewish state. It has also been the crowbar used to pry billions in reparations from Germany and billions in aid from the United States. Finally, it is the spectre used to silence any serious criticism of Israel."

Duke adds that the discovery of "emaciated, diseased bodies" by Allied soldiers in German concentration camps after the war do not prove the existence of a deliberate extermination policy by the Nazis.

Needless to say, Duke's revisionist ideology endeared him to racists around the country, and thus it was not surprising that he was the standardbearer of the far-right Populist party in the 1988 presidential election.

Campaigning on an "American first policy," Duke said he would revamp the welfare system, end all forced busing to achieve racial balance in schools, drastically limit immigration and reassess U.S. policy in the Middle East. When the ballots were counted, he had received 150,000 votes.

Since his stunning 1989 victory in Louisiana's state election, Duke has become a national figure. True, he has soft-pedalled his noxious views. But, as Zatarain judiciously reminds us, he clings to the principles he has always held.

David Duke, in other words, should be watched and monitored with the utmost vigilance.

David Duke celebrates his 1989 victory in Louisiana's state election.

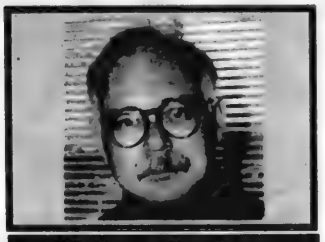
While still a student, Duke published a newsletter called The Racialist, which was distributed at Louisiana State University and local high schools. He railed against the usual targets — claiming, for example, that much of modern art was "anarchistic garbage created by Negroid and Jewish degeneracy," and that Jews were perverting the media.

Zatarain discloses that Duke visited Israel in the early 1970s, hoping that his trip would crystallize his inchoate but viscerally antagonistic view of Zionism. He spent two weeks in Israel, taking a room near Jaffa and touring the country from this base.

Duke's exposure to Israeli society convinced him that Israel was persecuting the Palestinians and that it was getting preferential treatment from the United States.

Returning to his university studies, Duke immersed himself in Klan activities. In 1973, he was elected grand dragon of the Louisiana chapter of the Knights of the Ku Klux Klan, as well as national information officer. He also edited The Crusader — formerly known as The Klansman — and ran a book store in a New Orleans suburb specializing in racist propaganda.

Meanwhile, Duke developed into a polished debater, speaking at rallies, debating opponents and appearing on TV talk shows.



Mideast Analysis

By Sheldon Kirshner

The Iraqi spectre

Four years have elapsed since the end of the Gulf War, and although defeat humbled Iraqi strongman Saddam Hussein, Iraq is far from repentent.

Iraq's oil-based economy has been devastated by United Nations sanctions and its population buffeted by severe rationing, rampant inflation, and, in extreme cases, malnutrition and infectious diseases.

Iraq, too, has lost control of its territory. The United States, Britain and France have carved up the north and the south into no-fly zones forbidden to Iraqi aircraft and created a special enclave for Iraqi Kurds, who were persecuted by the government before, during and immediately after the cessation of hostilities in the spring of 1991.

Despite the relentless international pressure, Iraq is still not in full compliance with the terms of the resolutions adopted by the Security Council.

Last month, the UN embargo was re-extended after the United Nations Special Commission (UNSCOM) charged Iraq with failure to account for a biological warfare program. What is more, Iraq refuses to renounce terrorism and to pay Kuwait — which it invaded in 1990 — reparations. Iraq recently rejected a UN proposal to set aside restitution funds from the sale of UN-sanctioned oil sales.

On the other hand, Iraq has belatedly recognized Kuwait's sovereignty and agreed to a rigorous surveillence plan under which its military potential will be vastly curtailed.

Nevertheless, analysts continue to regard Iraq as a wild card. Last October, in a sudden crisis caused by its desire to focus world attention on the sanctions, Iraq massed upwards of 75,000 troops near Kuwait's border, prompting the United States to dispatch an armed armada to the region. Saddam Hussein backed off, and the Security Council condemned Iraq once more.

Violating the spirit, if not the letter, of UN resolutions, Iraq also shows no signs of stopping its campaign of displacement against the Marsh Arabs, or of easing its blockade of the Kurdish safe haven. As well, in the past year, Iraq has been involved in illegal oil transactions to the tune of $700 million (a paltry sum compared to the past.)

More insidiously, according to U.S. satellite photographs, Iraq has been rebuilding its chemical factories, which could easily produce chemical warfare agents.

If the sanctions are eventually lifted and Iraqi oil is available again on the free market, Iraq will doubtless try to rebuild its once formidable armed forces. Indeed, the Clinton administration has warned that Iraq can regain the ability to develop weapons of mass destruction.

The spectre of a rearmed and swaggering Iraq is a source of serious concern — not only to the United States, but to Israel, which was hit by 39 Iraqi Scuds during the Gulf War. Washington has beefed up its forces in the area, while Israel has begun developing an anti-missile defence system. But as long as Saddam Hussein remains in power, Iraq will be a menace to its neighbors.

What can we learn from the holiday of Lag b'Omer which takes place on the 18th of Iyar, May 18?

The holiday is steeped in rich tradition yet has little formal ritual. Tradition traces the origins of Lag b'Omer to a turbulent time in Jewish history, filled with national hope, rebellion and Messianism. The central figure of Jewish life was Rabbi Akibah who supported the Messianic rebellion of the Jews led by Bar Kochbah against Roman rule, in the second century of the common era.

The rebellion was cruelly crushed and there was widespread oppression of Judaism. But the zealous religious fervor of Rabbi Akibah and his most famous disciple, Rabbi Simeon ben Yohai ignited an even greater devotion to Torah and religious faith.

Tradition records a terrible plague that devastated the students of Rabbi Akibah during the sefirah (counting) of the days between Pesach and Shavuot. On the 33rd day, Lag (33) b'Omer the plague stopped, calling forth a time for joy.

Years later, a formal season of mourning, including the prohibition of marriage and other joyous events, was instituted during this time. Later codifiers differed about the way the 33 days of mourning were to be counted. Lag b'Omer itself became a time of student celebration, with athletic contests and bows and arrows. While some of the daily prayers of the liturgy were omitted, there is no Hallel or other psalms of praise.

This day is often called a "semi-holiday" but there is a timeless and powerful message to be learned from the example of Rabbi Akibah who embodied the essence of Kiddush HaShem, genuine martyrdom.

The Talmud describes the last moments of Rabbi Akibah condemned to a cruel death by the Romans for the crime of rebellion. Rabbi Akibah refused to be humbled by the fear of death. Instead, he saw another opportunity to serve God, by fulfilling the command to serve God with "all your heart, soul and strength." To confront death with such courage of conviction has remained an ideal to guide future generations.

Dan family supports Jerusalem Outreach Fund

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Leslie and Judith Dan and their family have committed $6 million to the Aish HaTorah Jerusalem Outreach Fund, in addition to the $7 million already donated for the new Aish HaTorah headquarters opposite the Western Wall.

The new pledge by the chair and CEO of Novopharm and his family was disclosed in an emotional interview with the Toronto executive by Larry King in an international closed circuit broadcast from Los Angeles, with live feeds from Jerusalem, Moscow, New York and Toronto.

"The building in Jerusalem is only bricks. We need people to carry out the Discovery Outreach Program," Dan said, explaining his additional support.

"Why are you, a Reform Jew, supporting Aish HaTorah which is mainly Orthodox?" asked King.

"The majority may be Orthodox, but we are all Jews," Dan replied. "In Budapest I saw that the Germans were rounding up all Jews, not asking if they were Orthodox. We must unite and march together."

The Toronto segment was part of a powerful 90-minute program broadcast to 250 homes in North America.

The broadcast raised $1.4 million for outreach and included a pledge by Hollywood mogul Sumner Redstone, chair of Viacom, to raise $50 million in three years.

As King noted, Aish HaTorah faces competition for the minds and hearts of Soviet Jews from Messianic Hebrew Christians, a group he said operates out of Buffalo, N.Y. Dozens of Jews came forward in a Russian auditorium pledging, "Jesus is my Messiah," in a segment filmed in Russia and loaned to the broadcast by Jews for Judaism.

Jews will continue to emigrate to Israel from the C.I.S. at the rate of 60,000 to 70,000 a year, for a total of 400,00 to 500,000, to join the 600,000 already there, said Joel D. Tauber, president of the United Jewish Appeal in the United States.

Asked by King about problems facing Soviet immigrants in Israel, Tauber said, "They are lessening. There will be some problems with four or five per cent; they make a lot of noise. But 95 per cent are adjusting well."

Anti-Semitism does not motivate Jews to leave the C.I.S. for Israel, said Rabbi Sholom Schwartz of Aish HaTorah from Moscow.

"Positive values about Judaism are needed. We can only relight the spark and when that's lit, there is the possibility of coming home."

He described how Aish HaTorah is recruiting young Jews in the C.I.S., training them, sending them to six-week crash courses in Israel and then returning them to their own communities.

King's daughter, Chaia, will be among the 1,500 students to join 1,500 Russian pen pals in Jerusalem to celebrate the city's 3,000 birthday next year. The Aish HaTorah branch in Minsk will have a plaque honoring Larry King's parents and grandparents. His father came from Minsk and his mother from Pinsk.

One of the chilling scenes from Russia included an Australian filmed interview with Russian nationalist Vladimir Shirinovsky, who said it would be better for the world if all of its Jewish people lived in Israel. Other Russians were quoted as favoring the extermination of Jews.

"Russian Jews desperately need our help," said Redstone, co-chair with King of the Let My People Know campaign. "We must help them to leave before it is too late."

Among locations receiving the broadcast were Four Seasons Hotel, Beth Tzedec Synagogue and Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue. Rabbi Michael Skoback hosted the broadcast for students of the University of Toronto and York University.

Jewish Life

Use of Yiddish down but definitely not out

By DR. LEO DAVIDS

Although Yiddish was the almost-universal common tongue of Canadian Jews before World War II, we've all noticed that it is not heard very often in recent years. Some believe that it has "given up the ghost" in this country, while others argue that it is still holding on. What is the picture today? Can we get the facts, somewhere?

GUEST VOICES

Actually, the census of Canada provides wonderful information about languages. The census asks about mother tongue (your first language) and about your usual language currently spoken at home; there are also other language questions, but let's not get too complicated here. The answers to these questions give us a picture of what is now going on, if we believe what people tell the census!

In 1931, 96 per cent of all Jews in Canada reported that Yiddish was their mother tongue. But with every passing decade, the percentage has been going down (see the Historical Table below).

By 1971, just under 50,000 people reported Yiddish as their mother tongue, but this was less than one-fifth of all Canadian Jews that year. However, in 1971 the majority of Jews with Yiddish as a mother tongue still spoke mammeloshen at home; 53 per cent of the 50,000 mother tongue people also reported Yiddish to be their usual language at home. So it was still being used by over 26,000 people at home, making it their children's mother tongue! Of course, this home-language usage group was only a small minority (under 10 per cent) of all Canadian Jews in 1971.

What about now? The latest census was held in 1991, so we'll look at those numbers. The Yiddish mother tongue group in 1991 was a little over 21,000 people, not quite seven per cent of all Canadian Jews! There is a small additional group (of about 5,000 people in total) who reported multiple mother tongues — Yiddish plus another language.

Another language question

The number reporting that they usually talk Yiddish at home was 6,600 (about two per cent of the country's 1991 Jews), the majority living in the greater Montreal area. Although Toronto has a much larger Jewish population than Montreal, the number of Yiddish-speakers in Toronto is not even half of Montreal's!

But, there was another language question in 1991. When asked about all languages in which they could carry on a conversation, over 53,000 Canadians reported that they could talk Yiddish!

In each area/city, this total is much higher than the number who were raised with Yiddish as small children. So the picture is a lot more complicated than we thought; different census questions and definitions give us different answers!

In fact, the numbers suggest that a lot of Yiddish is transmitted not by the family, but through school and community contact. Otherwise, how could those now able to talk Yiddish be so much more numerous than those who first grew up with it at home? (Should we, perhaps, be suspicious of the claim — how real is that "able to converse" skill?)

The "bottom line" is still a long-term picture of language shrinkage. The well-known phrase "Use it or lose it" certainly applies here. Who's left today?

In Montreal, there are over 4,000 people who normally speak Yiddish at home. Unlike in the rest of the country, Montreal's home speakers are not predominantly old people; fully three out of five are under 60 years of age. It seems pretty obvious that these younger speakers are Chassidim. They keep Yiddish alive for their children, at home; no one else does. (In Toronto, only one out of eight Yiddish speakers is under 60!)

What a paradox! Today, in great contrast to previous generations, the real Yiddishisten are Chassidim, and the Canadian survival of the spoken language rests with them. In former times, the supporters of Yiddish education were usually very secular. They're gone, now. But the kids with the curled peyot (ear-locks) are still here, still talking the mammeloshen. Plus some French, occasionally.

Torch of remembrance passes on to students

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Thirty-four young people pledged to remember the past and to carry the torch for the future as they stood at the Holocaust Memorial monument at Earl Bales Park.

The bar and bat mitzvah students of Toronto's Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue held lighted torches and expressed their feelings about the tragic events of 50 years ago.

"By lighting these torches, we hand over to you the Flame of Remembrance for you to carry from generation to generation," said Goldie Raab, a member of the Yad Vashem organization. She is the wife of sculptor Ernest Raab, who created the Holocaust Memorial.

"When there will be no survivors left to witness the horrors of the Holocaust, it will be up to you to face the deniers, those forces who wish to eradicate this shameful episode from history, thereby covering their own guilt, and that of their followers," she said.

Rabbi Elliot Diamond, who conducted the service, told the students that they now had the responsibility "to try to remember."

Responding in English, Hebrew and Yiddish, the students recited original and traditional poems and stories.

Ernest Raab blew the shofar and the students placed flowers on the memorial and received a commemoration certificate from Dr. Joel Dimitry, national chair of the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem.

The special service was coordinated by the leaders of the bar and bat mitzvah programs, Brenda Lass, Beverly Young, Rochelle Diamond, Mindy Goodman and Barbara Ouanounou.

Earlier in the day, the students paid a visit to the Holocaust Museum at the Lipa Green Building.

Yom Hazikaron

Israeli soldiers' sacrifices saluted at BAYT service

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — They were childhood friends, and served in Lebanon together. They were 21 when they fell in battle.

The repetition of the tragically young ages of Israeli soldiers "when they fell in battle," read against a backdrop of their pictures under an Israeli flag, was the poignant centrepiece of last week's Yom Hazikaron service held at Beth Avraham Yoseph Congregation (BAYT) in Thornhill.

Sponsored by Mizrachi of Canada, Emunah Women of Toronto and Bnei Akiva of Toronto, the evening was attended by over 1,500 people of all ages.

As it is in Israel, Yom Hazikaron, a day to honor the memory of Israel's fallen soldiers, is immediately followed by the celebration of Yom Ha'atzmaut, Israel Independence Day.

According to the calendar, the two days would ordinarily fall on May 4 and 5, Thursday and Friday, but this year they were marked on May 3 and 4 to avoid overlapping with Shabbat.

The hall was decorated with blue and white balloons and streamers, and many of the excited children waved little Israeli flags.

Dror Zeigerman, consul-general of Israel, said that those killed from the early settlements at the turn of the century, through all the wars, to those murdered by terrorists, "were among our best. We pray the memory of the fallen will give us the courage to continue fighting.

"Through their death, they have bequeathed us life."

Never again, he pleaded, "should our children go to war. Never again will our enemies come against us. Never again will we have to bury our youth."

An emotional Rabbi Baruch Taub, spiritual leader of BAYT, said the attachment to Israel "is not merely nationalistic — it is the core of Torah.

"It is our sacred duty to recall the young Jews who gave their lives in defence of the people, the land and the state. Their lives and deaths were a statement of Torah."

As the flag was lowered, a moment of silence was followed by K'El Maleh Rachamim, sung by Chazzan Shlomo Sufrin of Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, and Kaddish, recited by Harvey Poch.

An innovation at this year's program was a play, written by Samuel Kapustan, and performed by Ulpanat Orot and Or Chaim students.

Fine performances, particularly by stars Ahavya Warzecha and Naomi Emerson as religious and secular mothers praying at the graves of their soldier sons, and Rina Fink as a recent immigrant, focused on some of the problems of Israeli society — religious-secular relations, economic strife and nepotism in government hiring.

The play concluded with a recognition that, for all the differences, the goals are the same — to build a lasting Israel.

As always, the highlight of the Yom Ha'atzmaut celebration, is the Daglanut, an intricate series of manoeuvres performed with Israeli flags by Ulpanat Orot students.

The young women, although somewhat restricted in their movements by the small stage, performed with infectious enthusiasm, and the audience responded with applause, whoops of encouragement and cheers.

A choir of Or Chaim students, accompanied with great panache by Tamar Emerson, had many in the audience humming along.

Greetings were brought from Mizrachi by Jerry Rosenfield, and on behalf of the government of Canada by Treasury Board chair Arthur Eggleton.

After Ma'ariv and Hatikvah, the evening concluded with a reception.

Oklahoma bombing a sign of growing hatred: Farber

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — In his 1978 novel The Turner Diaries, American white supremacist William Pearce (using the pen name Andrew MacDonald) describes how right-wing terrorists destroy a federal building in Washington D.C. using an ammonium nitrate fertilizer bomb.

Canadian Jewish Congress community relations director Bernie Farber read that passage aloud at a recent Yom Hashoah program at the Bloor Jewish Community Centre.

"It's chilling, because of the resemblance to the bomb blast in Oklahoma City," Farber said, referring to the April 19 bombing that killed more than 170.

"We're dealing with the Nazi mindset, the same Nazi mindset that murdered Jewish babies by throwing them into limepits," he said. "Nazism, my friends, is timeless."

For much of the past decade, Farber has been monitoring the activities of hate groups across Canada. He feels the Oklahoma City bombing is yet another sign that "danger is out there," he said.

Metro Toronto police statistics show reported hate crimes have risen by 61 per cent, with two-thirds of perpetrators under 25. "Today's hate groups are trying to attract young people," Farber said. "And the new face of anti-Semitism has unfortunately become attractive to some young people."

Using the computer Internet and rock music to spread their racist ideology, '90s hate peddlers are making inroads into the youth subculture. Audience members at a hate rock concert by RaHoWa (Racial Holy War) last year swarmed a young Tamil restaurant worker and paralyzed him with a kick in the head.

"We must be prepared to warn people that the slippery slope of racism slides right into Auschwitz and slides right into the bombing of the federal building in Oklahoma City," he said.

Christian service recalls Holocaust

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Survivors, members of the Allied forces, individuals who sheltered Jews during the war along with Jewish and Christian young people lit memorial candles for the six million who perished in the Holocaust at a recent Christian service.

Tapers lit from the memorial candles were held by Christians and Jews assembled at Bloor Street United Church for the 15th annual service.

Sponsored by the Christian-Jewish dialogue of Toronto, this year's service emphasized the 50th anniversary of the liberation of the concentration camps and Europe by the Allies. Rabbi Lawrence Pinsker said Kaddish.

In her sermon, Mary Jo Leddy, professor of theology at Regis College, said that Nazi Germany's totalitarianism, a "structure in which the various layers served to buffer one another against the shock of reality," was partially responsible for the Holocaust.

"The structure worked because millions of people, good people, normal people, did a good job. Someone signed the forms, another filled them, another drew up a list, another worked in a factory, another had to lay down the railway lines. Cumulatively they contributed to evil of great consequence and most never had to face the victims, never had to hear their screams," she said, adding that everyone was implicated yet no one wanted responsibility.

Although there were some Christians who reached out to Jews in mercy, she said the majority of Christians in Nazi-dominated Europe supported the Holocaust either "through what they did or through what they did not do and did not say."

At the Nuremberg trials very few of the Nazis felt responsible for what had happened, Leddy said, and with time many Germans were to feel a generalized sense of guilt but few claimed responsibility.

She noted that today some people are critical of recent proceedings against Nazi war criminals living in Canada, urging compassion for people who are old and sick, she maintained that "we need to reclaim the thread of human responsibility, which holds together the moral fabric of our society. Those who feel sorry for old war criminals are perhaps unintentionally saying that human life and human actions have no consequence."

Leddy warned that we will grant Hitler a posthumous victory if we believe we are powerless to respond to the genocides of our time, in Rwanda, Bosnia and East Timor.

Buchenwald survivors gather to commemorate liberation

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Hugging and kissing, eyes overflowing with tears of joy and sadness, some 500 men and women gathered last month in Tel Aviv to commemorate the 50th anniversary of their liberation from Buchenwald.

They were the Children of Buchenwald, the few who marched out of the gates of Buchenwald concentration camp after being liberated by the Americans.

Jerry Kapelus of Toronto, Eddy Baller of Montreal, and Robbie Wiseman of Vancouver were reunited with those who, as orphans, had become their family members half a century ago.

Kapelus was 10 when the war broke out. He, his sister, brother and parents were put into the Lodz Ghetto where he was sent to work in a leather factory. When the ghetto was liquidated in 1944, the 35,000 surviving Jews were sent to Auschwitz.

At the selection point, he was separated from his family, never to see them again. He told The CJN that although they could see the smoking chimneys, the Germans were so convincing in their lies that the survivors did not believe the rumors about what happened to their fellow Jews.

In January 1945, Kapelus was sent to Buchenwald. On April 11, 1945, he woke to find they had been liberated.

Kapelus and 450 others went to orphanages in France. Among those at his orphanage were Elie Weisel and the present Ashkenazi Chief Rabbi of Israel, Rabbi Israel Meir Lau, who spoke at the convention.

The Tel Aviv reunion brought together 200 survivors from the Diaspora with 300 who live in Israel.

Kapelus, who went to the reunion with his wife Merna, said he shared stories and memories with those who were in Auschwitz and those who had been sent to France. "There was a lot of talking," he said, a recent phenomenon.

Kapelus, who has three children and four grandchildren, says "to this day, I still don't understand it — it is a nightmare." Despite the pain of remembering, Kapelus goes to schools and speaks to the students about the Holocaust.

At the Children of Buchenwald gathering, Israeli and other community leaders participated in the services and programs, including former Israeli president Haim Herzog and Tel Aviv Mayor Roni Milo.

"We hope to meet in 10 years and have even made arrangements for a reunion in 50 years," Kapelus smiled.

Memories of Bergen-Belsen

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — After 50 years, the memory of what he found at Bergen-Belsen still haunts John Doerksen and makes him wonder why G-d permitted those atrocities to happen.

As a 21-year-old RCAF medical technician, Doerksen arrived at the camp just hours after it was liberated by the British Army. He described the scene as "horrendous ... people were just skin and bones. Whether you're a survivor or liberator it's an experience you can't forget."

Speaking at the 20th annual two-day Holocaust symposium for high school students, held at the University of British Columbia, Doerksen said the experience led him to enrol in a Bible college to try and find more answers to what he had seen in the camp.

"I'm a Christian guy and I believe in G-d and I have a lot of faith — but I'm human. I get emotional. I can't understand why G-d would permit something like this.

"As a Mennonite I've been taught that Jews are G-d's chosen people," he continued. "G-d's treatment of us depends very much on how we treat the Jews."

Doerksen said this was the first time he had ever spoken publicly about the Belsen experience.

At a Bergen-Belsen memorial meeting in Victoria, another medic spoke about his findings at the camp.

Dr. George Woodwark, a Victoria cardiologist, said conditions at the camp were unbelievable. He arrived there shortly after the British troops had taken over.

He said the situation was so terrible he has been unable to talk about it. After a few minutes on the podium, he broke down and was guided gently to his seat and comforted by Rabbi Victor Reinstein.

The doctor confirmed that a film shown at the meeting about the liberation was accurate. The film showed thousands of bodies scattered around, which the SS officers at the camp were ordered to bury.

Forum addresses Mideast developments

By SUSAN MERSKEY
CJN Correspondent

LONDON — Israel must not allow terrorist activities to kill the peace process, was the message of a recent public affairs forum here attended by about 60 people.

The forum, organized by London Hadassah-WIZO and sponsored by the London Jewish Federation and the Jewish National Fund, addressed Mideast developments.

Speakers Chaim Waxman, Israel's vice-consul in Toronto, and David Goldberg of the Canada-Israel Committee both said peace is a prerequisite for ending terrorism.

Waxman said much has been accomplished since the Oslo accords were signed, but more remains to be done.

Goldberg spoke of a change in terrorist threats, which have moved away from the secular Palestinians — primarily the PLO, the PLF and Fatah — and now come from the Muslim fundamentalist groups Hamas and Islamic Jihad, who are pledged to eliminate not only Israel but also the more moderate, secular Arabs who favor the peace process.

The fundamentalists, Goldberg said, want to re-establish an Islamic world similar to the one of the seventh century. Their leaders preach the glory of dying for the cause, an attitude which does much to explain the current proliferation of suicide bombings, he said.

St. Andrew-St. Patrick could be bellwether riding

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

ONTARIO ELECTION '95

TORONTO — Though their borders overlap somewhat, the mid-Toronto riding of St. Andrew-St. Patrick doesn't quite have the bellwether reputation of its federal counterpart, St. Paul's.

Still, for the past three elections, the area's voters have anticipated province-wide trends, sending to Queen's Park Tory Larry Grossman in 1985, Liberal Ron Kanter in 1987 and New Democrat Zanane Akande in 1990. Coincidentally, each was a representative of the winning party.

This time around, the field is wide open as candidates for the three major parties agree 1995 will be a three-horse race.

Lawyer David Jacobs is hoping to retain St. Andrew for the New Democrats, family practitioner Dr. Carolyn Bennett is representing the Liberals and television producer/reporter Isabel Bassett is contesting it for the Tories.

Isabel Bassett

"People feel it's time for a change," Bassett said. "I say they've got two choices. Our plan says we have to manage our money carefully to preserve education, health and community safety ... On the other hand, you've got [Premier Bob] Rae's approach: tax, tax, tax, spend, spend, spend. In the middle, you don't know." Liberal leader Lyn McLeod has "flip flopped" so often, her positions on key issues isn't clear, she said.

The Tories' main focus will be on boosting the economy. That can be accomplished by creating an atmosphere in which business can thrive and by eliminating restrictions, such as the New Democrats' labor legislation, Bill 40, which, among other provisions, prevents the use of replacement workers during strikes. Legislation like that scares entrepreneurs away from Ontario, she contends.

In addition, the Tories plan to continue their pro-business tilt by removing employee health care tax for small businesses, instituted by the Liberals, Bassett said.

The Tories will be more prudent with taxpayers' dollars. "Someone has to say No to spending money on every single thing. You can't spend money you don't have on and on," Bassett said.

Jacobs, a member of the legal committee of B'nai Brith's League for Human Rights, defends the NDP record and counterpunches with attacks at the federal Liberals.

PREVIOUS ELECTION RESULTS:

1990

Zanana Akande (NDP)	10,321
Nancy Jackman (PC)	9,241
Ron Kanter (LIB)	8,938
Plurality	1,080
Voter Turnout	66.9%

1987

Ron Kanter (LIB)	14,159
Larry Grossman (PC)	10,483
Gladys Rothman (NDP)	5,608
Plurality	3,676
Voter Turnout	64.5%

It's nonsense to say Ontario's economic downturn was caused by NDP policies, he said.

"We inherited a mess and a deficit from Lyn McLeod's and David Peterson's Liberals and were subjected to billion of dollars in discrimination from Brian Mulroney's government starting in 1990," he said.

Rae made difficult decisions, reduced government expenditures and created jobs at the fastest tempo in Canada while preserving health care and social services, he argued.

Carolyn Bennett

A native of the Welsh town of New Tredegar, Jacobs said he is stressing health care and Rae's key role in fighting for Ontario's fair share of federal dollars.

"We need leadership in Ontario that will have the integrity and courage to stand up for people and fight against the cutbacks that are unfairly and disproportionately hitting the people of Ontario," he said.

Bennett, a family practitioner, becomes quite animated when discussing health care. "It's sad to see what the NDP have done to health care," she said. The health care system must be reformed and made more accountable for the massive tax dollars that go to support it.

Bennett, who ironically is doctor to Bassett's children (Bassett says she's working to keep her there), says money could be saved through simple measures like providing patients with a "cuff" to take their own blood pressure or by reducing the number of cholesterol checks.

"The health system can't be a candy store any more."

Like Bassett, she agreed that changing the economic climate in Ontario is crucial.

"People see that Ontario is not a good place to open a business," she said. "We must encourage the entrepreneurial spirit. Government has been in the way of that."

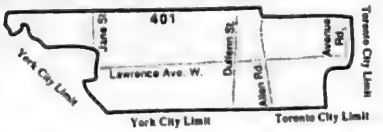
Lawrence: the smallest riding in Metro Toronto



ONTARIO ELECTION '95

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

Emilia Valentini

Joseph Cordiano

TORONTO — A newcomer to politics, the Progressive Conservative candidate, Emilia Valentini, 34, is opposing a political veteran, 37-year-old Joseph Cordiano, who has held Lawrence riding for the Liberal party since 1987. He represented Downsview from 1985 to 1987.

Although the New Democratic Party ran a strong second in the 1990 election won by Bob Rae, garnering more than 10,000 votes, it had not nominated a candidate for this riding one week before the nomination deadline.

Described as the smallest provincial riding in Metro Toronto, with 40,787 eligible voters, Lawrence has a significant number of Jewish residents, most of them adjacent to Bathurst Street, east and west, from Baycrest Avenue and Orchard Grove on the north to Shelborne Avenue on the south. Most of the riding is west of the Allen Expressway, south of 401 to the York city limits.

Though Valentini and Cordiano both agree that Italians are the largest ethnic group in the riding, the P.C. candidate estimates the Jewish vote at 25 per cent, while the Liberal says it is 10 per cent. Both agree that it is important to the outcome.

Cordiano said the voters are fed up with the NDP government and want a change for the better in economic conditions.

"The NDP campaign in general in this election has been bizarre," he said. "Bob Rae appears to be in a daze."

A co-owner of a restaurant on Dufferin Street, Valentini says times are so tough that a lot of Italian couples have moved back in with their parents to save money. The downturn in the business climate in the past few years has resulted in the downsizing of some industries and the sudden availability of lots on Caledonia Avenue for new business. As a result, jobs are a big concern in the riding.

Some seniors fear that the NDP government's bill to reform long-term care services in Metro Toronto will mean that those services will not be as ethnically sensitive as before, Cordiano said.

"There is genuine concern that Baycrest Centre and Villa Columbo will not be able to serve their own populations as well as they did. The Liberal party introduced a bill for one-stop shopping for senior services, but the NDP turned it on its head, requiring that one agency provide 80 per cent of the services."

Valentini says a lot of people on the doorstep have told her they don't trust any political party or the promises they make.

Both candidates say safety is uppermost in the minds of many voters particularly since a shooting last year outside an after-hours club on Dufferin Street, in which two people died. The club has since closed.

In that vicinity, there was so much noise that parents had trouble getting their children to fall asleep, Valentini said.

As a member of the opposition, Cordiano said he helped convince the government to give Metro Toronto new powers to license after-hours clubs.

Job security on voters' minds

ONTARIO ELECTION '95

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jobs are the single biggest issue in Ontario's election campaign, Mississauga North Liberal incumbent Steven Offer says bluntly.

"Job security has gone out the window," the Jewish MPP told The CJN in a recent interview. "Many people have lost jobs, many for the first time in their lives.

Mississauga North

Offer will be running in the June 8 vote against the New Democrats' Dan Chekhar and John Snobelen for the Conservatives.

The electorate's concerns haven't changed much since the 1990 vote, Offer said, and that have even been heightened in such areas as health care and education.

The Liberals, he said, will create a climate for economic growth, with no tax increases, while balancing the budget in their first term.

"We will cut back on the regulatory burden of businesses doing business, and will implement specific programs for youth and the unemployed."

Offer, a 46-year-old lawyer, was first elected to the Ontario Legislature in 1985, and re-elected in 1987 and 1990.

One of four Jewish MPPs, Offer has been parliamentary assistant to the minister of consumer and commercial relations; chair of the Ontario Advisory committee on liquor regulations; and parliamentary assistant to the attorney general.

From August 1989 until the 1990 election, he was Solicitor General, Ontario's top law enforcement officer.

In opposition, he was labor critic from 1990 to 1993, and is now environment critic.

A Liberal government, he said, would scrap the Interim Waste Authority, which had a mandate to find three mega-dumps — one in Peel, one in York Region (to handle waste from York and Metro Toronto) and one in Durham.

"We want responsibility for waste management to go back to the regions where it used to be, and where it should be."

Steven Offer

Offer said he is "disturbed" by desecrations of synagogues and other examples of racism and anti-Semitism. The emphasis must be, he said, on discussion of the issue and on how hate can be combatted.

Offer believes that through the years, he been responsive and accessible.

"People don't always agree with you, but I have found that they generally have an understanding of what you do. They are willing to work with their elected representatives to make the community a better place."

He is concerned about the cynicism many feel about politicians and government in general.

"I feel with passion that people want to know the specifics. You have to be willing to unfold yourself and be accountable."

He and his party, he said, won't make "wide-eyed promises" that will be broken "the day after the election. We are being realistic and responsible. We only say and do what we can commit to."

Offer, his wife Karen and three daughters are involved in Solel Congregation, the Reform synagogue in Mississauga. "It is not just a place for prayer and education — it's a real community place, for friendship and getting together."

Gazans 'frustrated': reporter

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — After one year of Palestinian self-rule, there has been no change in virtually any aspect of life in the Gaza Strip, says CBC Radio's Jerusalem correspondent.

Gazans still depend on Israel for jobs because Palestinian Authority leader Yasser Arafat has been unable to create real employment outside policing and administration, Mark Lavie told an audience recently at Beth David synagogue.

That's reflected in polls, Lavie stated. One recent survey found that 77 per cent of Gaza residents are "frustrated" after a year of self-rule.

Lavie, a familiar voice to many Canadians, said there has been "no change" in Gaza; not in infrastructure, not in jobs and not in appearance. On radio, "you have trouble conveying the smell of Gaza. You can not only smell and see the raw sewage, you feel it."

While some Gazans blame Israel for closing its borders with the self-rule areas, others blame the extremist Hamas and Islamic Jihad groups for their plight. But, Lavie said, "everyone blames Arafat for not being able to make it all work."

On the plus side, Palestinians, unlike other Arabs, want democratic elections because of 27 years of exposure to Israeli democracy, Lavie said.

He said "one of the most significant developments" in Israeli society is that "terrorism works inside Israel. Terrorist attacks have changed the political map, and Israelis are terrified."

Lavie cited another poll that found 85 per cent of Israelis are worried or very worried that terrorism will harm them personally.

And he said the majority of Israelis — 60 per cent — now favor dependence on the military, versus 40 per cent who want negotiations with Palestinians to continue. As well, 70 per cent of Israelis oppose ceding the Golan Heights to Syria, even in return for a full peace, Lavie said.

Lavie said it's still too early to tell whether self-rule works and he predicted "varying degrees of turmoil to come."

Winnipeg school complex launched

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — A warm sun shone on dignitaries and guests as the Winnipeg Jewish community broke ground May 5 for the Jewish Community Campus.

The $26-million campus, to be built at the site of the former Fort Osborne Barracks in south Winnipeg, will house Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate, Ramah Elementary School, the YMHA Jewish Community Centre, a library, community offices, a 200-seat lecture theatre and a new Jewish Museum of Western Canada.

"We are on the threshold of a new era," said Rabbi Alan Green of Beth Israel synagogue.

All three levels of government were represented at the ground breaking ceremony.

Lloyd Axworthy was seated front and centre on a temporary stage along with leaders of major Jewish organizations.

Manitoba Premier Gary Filmon said the location of the campus was appropriate because the buildings on site were originally educational institutions.

Filmon also presented Sheldon Berney, president of the Jewish Community Campus Corporation, with the first of two $500,000 government cheques for the project.

Winnipeg Mayor Susan Thompson praised the vision and leadership behind the project while Michael Werier, representing the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council, spoke of the cost-efficient and community-wide programs the campus will provide beginning in the fall of 1997.

"The campus will be a source of pride for many years to come," Werier said.

Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate Grade 9 student Simon Tudiver, who will be in the first graduating class at the new location, spoke of the growing enrolment and crowded conditions at the school.

Women often made scapegoats: MP

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Mother's Day is a time to reflect on the forces that are trying to erase women's advances in society, says Liberal MP Sheila Finestone.

"People look for a scapegoat and some Canadians feel that if women were not in the work force all would be right," she told a recent breakfast meeting of the Shaarei Shomayim Brotherhood held in honor of Mother's Day.

Finestone, secretary of state with the dual responsibility of multiculturalism and the status of women, said the reality is that most women must work.

"Women are not a reserve army of labor. Their efforts are critical to the lives of their families ... We cannot afford to stifle the abilities of half of the country."

Finestone said people must be vigilant against those who threaten to erode women's rights. "It takes everyone to work in partnership in order to make sure women make advances."

Golden seeks better way of managing GTA

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — "Lucky, lucky, lucky," says Anne Golden, summing up her career path with a mix of humor and sincerity.

She admits that she took on her present position with some trepidation. Golden, 53, was appointed chair of the Greater Toronto Area (GTA) Task Force by Ontario Premier Bob Rae earlier this year.

During an interview last month, shortly after moving into her new office, Golden expressed some concerns. "I think it's fair to say we're in trouble. There's a financial crisis. We have to figure out a better way of governing and managing."

Golden and the four other members of the task force (architect Jack Diamond, consultant Thomas McCormack, University of Toronto president Robert Prichard and family practitioner Dr. Joseph Wong), aided by a small office staff, have 18 months to address issues such as taxes, public safety, transportation and land use.

She anticipates that the task force will recommend significant changes. "I believe the problems we face are not going to be solved by small tinkering."

Golden said their timeframe "is tight, but I believe we can accomplish a lot."

Anne Golden

Of immediate concern to the task force — not in terms of importance but in terms of time, she said — is reviewing Toronto's property tax system, a longstanding issue which Rae wants resolved by Sept. 30.

Rising to a challenge is nothing new for Golden. As president of the United Way of Greater Toronto for the past seven years (a position from which she is currently on leave), she was responsible for the success of Canada's largest annual fundraising campaign ($48.5 million in 1994), despite tough economic times.

She also fought a successful uphill battle as operations coordinator for David Crombie's mayoralty campaign in 1972.

A historian by training, Golden worked as a political researcher and adviser in the Ontario government after volunteering for Crombie. She left her position as director of Liberal policy research for the Ontario Liberal party before joining the United Way in 1982.

Her new position draws on her previous government and community experience. "It brings together everything I've ever done," said Golden.

Professional experience aside, Golden is a born-and-bred Torontonian with a "passion" for the city. Her ideas about what makes Toronto unique are generic and personal at the same time.

"We are a community of communities. We sort of discovered before others that when you have people living downtown it's better, safer, nicer," she said.

"In Toronto we've always had respect for the importance of roots. Toronto is one of the most multicultural cities in the world. We need to nurture those feelings of tolerance and respect for diversity."

She traces her own understanding of ethnic pride to the Jewish values with which she was raised and the importance she places on her own Jewish identity. Her late father, Teddy Richmond, whose involvement in the community included heading the United Jewish Appeal, was a strong influence on her, she said.

Borovoy issues free speech alarm to Jewish community

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Some Jewish community organizations are jeopardizing both freedom of speech and public education through their support of anti-hate legislation and advocacy of the public funding of Jewish schools, a leading civil liberties lawyer has charged.

The positions taken by many Jewish organizations "have been hurting those two key values," said Alan Borovoy at the Council of Jewish Brotherhoods' annual spring breakfast held recently at Beth Tikvah Synagogue.

The general counsel of the Canadian Civil Liberties Association, Borovoy called freedom of speech the lifeblood of the democratic system and a vehicle for mobilizing support for the redress of our grievances.

"That's what we used so effectively to fight the discrimination committed against us," he said.

Commenting on the prosecution of hatemongers, Borovoy insisted "there is no point in prosecuting a bunch of nobodies.

Alan Borovoy

"I don't like inflicting on the Jewish and general public what amounts to a gratuitous obscenity [Holocaust denials]. With a little imagination we can contain the influence of the hatemongers in our society without resorting to this kind of thing."

People like Zundel whose "influence in our community hovers around zilch" do not worry him. "It would bother me if a person were a teacher or a mayor and spouting that kind of thing."

Borovoy recommended instead strengthening anti-discrimination programs in the areas of employment and housing as well as shoring up the educational programs of the Human Rights Commission.

On the subject of public funding of Jewish schools, he said if full funding for Jewish schools became a constitutional right, other religions would be entitled to it as well. "And at what point will we have the mainstream Protestants coming forward and asking for it also? They who have had their religious practices removed from the public schools and now they see the other groups being funded?"

He wondered what would become of public schools, which he thinks have contributed much to the integration of the community. "Jews and gentiles, blacks and whites, and numbers of other people went to school together. They had the experience of working together, playing together, eating together. All of these day-to-day experiences helped to lower and remove the barriers to inter-group acceptance in our society."

Exercise plays useful role in aiding Parkinson's patients

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — "A lot of exciting things in surgical approaches to treating Parkinson's disease are being done in Toronto," Dr. Maureen Shandling, Mount Sinai Hospital, said recently at the Medical Clinic Day sponsored by Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care at the Wagman Centre.

About one per cent of those over 65 suffer from Parkinson's, a total of 70,000 Canadians, Shandling said.

Patients with the disease may benefit as much from exercise as from drugs, she said, suggesting t'ai chi as a suitable exercise for them. Dietary manipulation involving a redistribution of proteins may also help. Recently Internet support groups have been helping patients with Parkinson's.

It takes 15-20 years for a Parkinson's patient to reach the stage of not being able to walk, Shandling said. The drug L-Dopa is the most effective treatment and patients will probably be on it for the rest of their days.

"At the end of the line there is not much point in continuing medication," she said. "It is better to have an alert, immobile patient than an agitated patient receiving medication and wandering everywhere."

Referring to other new developments in treating geriatric disorders, Dr. Morris Freedman said it is important to distinguish between patients with Alzheimer's disease and those with frontal lobe dementia (FLD), as treatment regimens are somewhat different. Freedman is director of the Behavior Neurology Program of Baycrest Centre's Rotman Research Institute.

Frontal lobe dementia is a new entity not recognized before. About five per cent of those with Alzheimer's disease look like they might have this other form of dementia, he said. In FLD, language is not affected early, but in Alzheimer's it is. There is reduced speech output and good comprehension in FLD, but lots of speech with impaired comprehension in Alzheimer's.

A new diagnostic tool, SPECT, (Single Photon Emission Computed Tomography) which measures cerebral blood flow is proving valuable in Alzheimer's disease, Freedman said, although, he added, "There is a lot of controversy about it. Some neurologists never do it. Some do. I use it and find it very reliable."

There is no cure for Alzheimer's disease, he said. The drug L-deprenyl has been given a six-year trial, "but we don't know if it works; there is some evidence that it inhibits cell death."

In the next five or 10 years, he said, the emphasis in Alzheimer's disease will be in the recovery of neuron function, and in prevention.

Iraqi Jews take their place in all areas of Israeli society

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — No longer an alienated group, the 265,000 Iraqi Jews living in Israel have stopped complaining about Israeli society, said a former Israeli cabinet minister.

Until recently, the Israeli educational system and Israeli society in general were predominantly stimulated by the eastern European influence, according to Mordechai Ben-Porat, a focus which resulted in low self-esteem among young people of Iraqi, Moroccan and Yemenite origin.

When a Knesset education committee studied textbooks in 1977, they found the books were virtually "empty of any heritage of the Jews who came from Arab and Muslim countries," he said.

Through the revision of textbooks to reflect the diversity of Israeli society and the ongoing educational efforts of the Babylonian Jewry Heritage Centre (BJHC), the gap between Jews of Iraqi origin and mainstream Israeli society has been bridged, he said.

Today Iraqi Jews are active in all areas of Israeli society, including its political life. Thirteen members of the Knesset are of Iraqi origin and six Iraqi Jews, including Ben-Porat, have served in the Cabinet.

He spoke at a recent fundraiser for the BJHC sponsored by the Iraqi Jewish Association of Ontario and the Sephardi study program of York University. The evening featured an exhibit of historic photographs that Ben-Porat, now the chair of the centre, brought with him.

The BJHC museum, which opened in Or Yehuda in 1988, displays "an impressive exhibition of the cultural heritage of the Jewish Diaspora's most ancient community," he said.

The centre is currently in the midst of an expansion program and is seeking additional photographs for its collection.

Memorial garden named

TORONTO — A man who always liked country life best is being honored by a memorial garden in the Peterborough Ecological Garden in his name.

Lakefield area civic leader Jack Harris died recently at 67. He moved from Toronto to the rural area, where he lived for 22 years and was a Smith Township home improvement judge and a director of the Lakefield Horticultural Society.

But he was best known to the children along the Trent River as the "ice cream man" who sold treats from a refrigerated truck he develped himself. They also knew him as a clown who handed out lollipops in Lakefield during Canada Day parades or dressed up in a top hat and tails for Queen Victoria events.

A resourceful man, Harris was credited with inventing the safety cap which protects children from hazardous liquids.

Harris, at one time a member of the Baycrest board of directors, was a son of Dr. William Harris, a well-known Toronto family doctor. He was vice-president and manager of Kert Chemicals and a one-time hardware store operator.

Young entrepreneurs help companies save money

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Shaun Rootenberg and Jeff Greenberg, the principals of Normeric Financial Consultants Inc., try to help companies save money by offering various services related to credit and collections.

Third party collection agencies are costly — they charge hefty commissions — and can be avoided if companies structured their in-house collections departments to operate more efficiently, according to Rootenberg and Greenberg.

"The concept is simple: increase productivity in collections and reduce write-offs," Greenberg said in an interview. "What is difficult is the ability to analyze specifically what your clients' needs are and identify those needs by creating credit policies and guidelines that meet a company's specific needs."

Rootenberg said the company uses a "revolutionary credit scoring profile" for lending institutions which use credit scoring as criteria for extending credit.

Normeric offers an on-site management service — long or short term — to upgrade and/or restructure credit departments and train staff to be more efficient. The company also audits in-house credit and collection files, as well as those listed with credit agencies.

Normeric monitors credit and collection companies to make sure they follow through with collections, Greenberg said. "The motto of many third party credit and collections agencies is that they are the police of the industry. We police the police so that the client is better served ... Many things fall through the cracks because of the sheer volume."

Normeric's target market is Fortune 500 companies with receivables worth millions of dollars, Rootenberg said. "We have managed to either reduce delinquency [customers not paying bills] or enhance recovery [of monies owed] by between three and 15 per cent on average."

He said it's cheaper for companies to pay a flat consulting fee to a company like Normeric than a commission to a collection company; and companies who owe money prefer the involvement of a consultant to a collection agency.

He stressed that the use of third party collection agencies is necessary at times but advises a more judicial use of this arm of the industry.

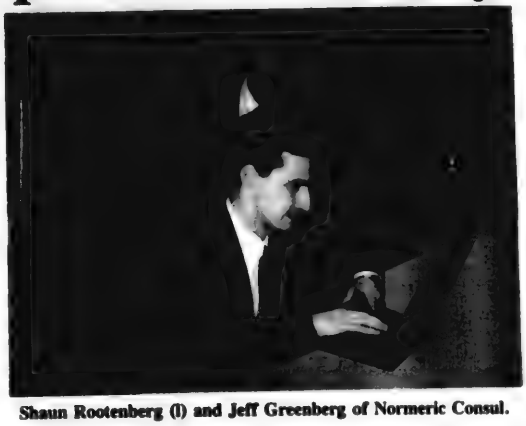
Rootenberg, 27, and Greenberg, 25, have had experience in the collections industry. After graduating with a degree in English in 1990, Rootenberg took what he thought would be a temporary job in collections at a finance company.

But he discovered that he had a natural aptitude and a keen interest in credit and collections and moved to a job at a large agency where he specialized in portfolio analysis.

Here he met Greenberg, a graduate of a college marketing and accounting program.

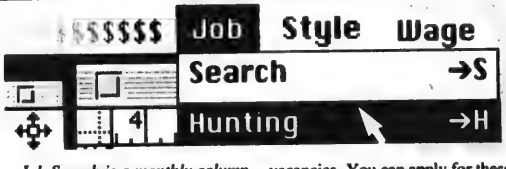
The partners said they both had observed that clients relied on collection agencies to do work that could have been done in-house, and the collection company did not always follow through effectively.

In September 1994, Rootenberg and Greenberg incorporated their company. They said the projected earnings in the first year of operation will be about $200,000.



Shaun Rootenberg (l) and Jeff Greenberg of Normeric Consul.

Greenberg said he is optimistic about Normeric's future. "We offer a unique service that will benefit any company that issues a large amount of credit. What company wouldn't benefit from having more money in their bank accounts?"



Job Search is a monthly column on job searching techniques by jobsearch consultant Lisa Galet. Readers are invited to forward any questions to The CJN.

After looking for work, month after month, you tend to get depressed, demotivated, downhearted. This change in attitude is normal and to be expected. But after you have taken your allotted time to be depressed, get cracking. You have a lot of catching up to do.

This article will concentrate on where to look to find out about jobs.

Make time to read the newspaper every day. Do not forget the weekly papers, nor the neighborhood rags. To save money you can do this at the library. You should read a copy of the Calgary magazine Jobs, Jobs, Jobs. This is a weekly publication of jobs available in a wide variety of fields. Call your local library to see if they have it.

You should visit a Canada Employment Centre every week and use the computerized job banks there. If you need to know how to use them, you can ask a staff person for assistance. The terminals are accessible for wheelchair users. Some of the postings in the job bank can be reached by touch-tone phone. In the Toronto area dial 954-5107.

Many large companies have hotlines on which they record their job vacancies. You can apply for these jobs. Call a company you would be interested in working for and ask them if they have a job hotline.

Try and attend a weekly networking group to meet people in your line of work, hear about job openings "through the grapevine" and keep up your morale. The Executive Advanced Recruitment Network meets in Toronto once a week at a central location. Their number is 466-6891.

Many professional organizations also have network meetings for their unemployed members. Look in the phone book under Association or Canadian and find a group you are interested in. Call and see if you can get involved.

Local Boards of Education sometimes have career centres available to the public. The Toronto Centre for Career action is funded by the Toronto Board of Education and is for men and women who would like a place to do research for their job search. The centre has computers for use, a fax machine and a large library. It also offers career-related seminars. The centre can be reached by calling 393-0550.

Some larger cities have career centres available to the public. In Toronto, Times Change Women's Employment Centre offers seminars on creating a resume, computers for writing resumes and letters, a fax machine, a library of career-related information and a large job board with postings from many companies that cover a wide variety of jobs. Times Change can be reached by calling 927-1900. In Ottawa call Women Career Counselling at 241-5414; and in Windsor call Career Probe West at 944-2265.

If you have decided that you would like to begin your own business and you are currently receiving Unemployment Insurance, contact your caseworker to find out about the Self-Employment Assistance Program. Recipients of other forms of assistance may be eligible for a similar program through jobsOntario.

Anyone can contact a Canada Business Service Centre. Each province has its own office. In Ontario the number is 416-954-4636. The Service Centres offer information on government programs and services.

For every opportunity you discover, promptly send a resume and covering letter.

My odyssey into freedom proved difficult

By FANIE KRONGOLD

Spring 1945. I was 21, on the threshold of adulthood.

I had been liberated on Jan. 16, 1945, by the Russian army in Czestochowa, Poland. I had lost all my family and was facing freedom lonely and alone, broken in body and soul.

It was a beautiful Polish spring. The sun was shining, the birds were singing, contrasting with my despair. I was the only survivor of a large family, facing the realities of life without food or shelter, education or guidance.

My odyssey into freedom was a difficult one, and survival from day to day was a struggle. No soup kitchens were open, and I lived in constant fear of being raped by Russian soldiers.

In May I met a man, a fellow survivor who became my husband. Together we have built a future. We have children and grandchildren.

Fifty years later the memory of the beautiful Polish spring contrasting with my empty heart is still fresh and alive.

Survival in Stalin's gulag

By ANN SZEDLECKI

May 8, 1945. I walk through a deserted marketplace in Ust-Kamenogorsk, Siberia, just before midnight. Even though I am not a concentration camp survivor, I have survived Stalin's gulag.

I hear over the town's loudspeakers (private radios were not allowed) that Germany's surrender is imminent.

Quietly I let myself into the little room I share with Katie, my Russian landlady, her two children, other relatives and a cow.

Music, singing and crying wake me up shortly after sunrise May 9. I join the crowd celebrating Nazi Germany's defeat and head for the town's square. It is a beautiful day but I feel that the terrible truth is about to descend upon us.

Not everything was joyful: there were lots of tears, remembering the victims, soldiers and common people who did not survive to see that day.

I lost a brother in Russia and upon returning to Poland I learn the fate of the rest of my family. They were all gone.

Liberation on the road to Schwerin

By JUDITH RUBENSTEIN

I was liberated by the American army on May 3, 1945, on the road to the city of Schwerin in North Westphalia, Germany.

We — 1,000 hungry, tired women — had left our camp in Malhow on May 1 under heavy guard. The weather was still chilly, especially when it rained. We slept on the wet ground for a couple of hours, and began to march again. The only sustenance we had was the rain we caught in our mouths.

By the afternoon of the second day, our tormentors had suddenly disappeared, and we found ourselves abandoned in no man's land.

The ditches on the side of the road were filled with medals, insignias and guns left behind by the cowardly SS guards.

Ten of us girls who had known each other previously decided to hide in an attic on the outskirts of a small village. The Geman population had left in haste, knowing that the Russian army was just a few kilometres away. We buried ourselves in the hay, hoping we could survive this final ordeal. Although our bodies were totally exhausted, our hunger prevented us from falling asleep.

We heard people speaking French in the yard, and the heavenly aroma of coffee came wafting up to our hiding place. One by one, we found the courage to come down, and we met a group of young French PoWs cooking on an open fire.

Walking barefoot

They welcomed us with a hot cup of coffee and a huge slice of bread. They told us they had broken into a German military warehouse and found more food than they could carry away. They had information that the American army was not far away, and they planned to walk all night to reach them.

We were offered protection and food if we were willing to help push the little wagon carrying their food supply. We agreed, and walked all night, with exploding bombs lighting up the rainy darkness. Early in the morning, we stopped at a farm house, asking permission to rest for a few hours in the barn. The good farmer refused to let us in, and so we slept once again in the open field. Refreshed, we continued on our journey toward freedom.

By that time, my shoes had no soles and I was walking barefoot on the frozen ground. By early afternoon, we reached a forest and decided to stay there, since we were totally exhausted. As I sat nursing my sore feet, a loud yell drew my attention toward the main road.

The first American tank had arrived, its star-spangled banner proudly waving. All of a sudden, the forest came alive. Refugees who had been hiding behind the trees ran out, kissing the boots of the American soldiers. We really frightened them, as we all looked like aliens from another planet. That night, still hungry, we slept in the attic over a barn, but we were free at last, and our spirits soared.

The rescued group of 10, Schwerin, June 1945.

By May 5, we were taken to Schwerin by former inmates on an abandoned German truck. The Red Cross fed us, and we settled into former Nazi headquarters.

Shavuot fell on May 18 and 19, and we were determined to celebrate our liberation by commemorating this joyous Jewish holiday.

My cousin Regina, who had been with me in Auschwitz, decided to light holiday candles. A lights-out curfew was in effect at the time, and since we had no window covering, the light was noticed by the American patrols.

They charged into the building, demanding to know why we were disobeying orders. Two of the soldiers stood by the door, tears running down their cheeks. These two middle-aged men were Jewish and they realized we were also Jews, celebrating our deliverance from our enemies. They became our mentors and adoptive fathers, slowly restoring our faith and dignity. Their simple human decency helped to heal our deep emotional wounds.

Knesset presses ahead with land appropriation

Palestinian officials condemn vote

Staff and wire services

JERUSALEM — The Rabin government is going ahead with its plan to appropriate 140 acres of mostly Arab-owned land in east Jerusalem, but has vowed to end the confiscations for the remainder of its term in office.

At the weekly cabinet meeting Sunday, Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin pledged to stop confiscations for housing construction.

The pledge came after the cabinet approved plans, announced in April, to appropriate the 140 acres in order to build Jewish housing and a police station.

Four ministers from the dovish Meretz bloc voted against the confiscations, and four Labor Party ministers abstained.

Palestinian officials condemned the vote. "There is a serious and continuing attempt to swallow Jerusalem land piece by piece, and this threatens the whole peace process," said Nabil Sha'ath, the Palestinian Authority official in charge of planning.

The Palestinians want east Jerusalem as the capital of their would-be state.

Religious Affairs Minister Shimon Shetreet also opposed the cabinet move, believing it is too restrictive. Shetreet favors more land expropriation in Jerusalem.

'Contrary to peace'

Three leading Israeli authors, demonstrating outside the Prime Minister's Office in Jerusalem on Sunday, called on the government to reverse the expropriation order.

"The step that the government is about to take today is precisely contrary to peace," author David Grossman told Israel Radio.

He said the confiscations would only serve to "eternalize the state of war" between Israel and the Palestinians.

The Israeli human rights group B'Tselem criticized the land confiscations as a violation of Palestinian rights and international law.

Israeli officials have defended the confiscations as necessary to accommodate the city's natural expansion.

In an attempt to defuse international criticism, Foreign Minister Shimon Peres said about 60 per cent of the land to be confiscated is owned by Jews and that 400 of the new apartments planned to be built on the confiscated land would be for Palestinians.

The cabinet statement said Israel "has no intention of carrying out further confiscations for the purpose of housing in Jerusalem."

Government officials are hoping the pledge will take the steam out of the current UN Security Council debate on the issue.

At a session last Friday, some 20 countries condemned Israel's actions during a rare open debate. All the council members, with the exception of the American representative, called for some sort of action against Israel.

The United States vowed to block a Security Council resolution condemning Israel, saying any UN move would only hinder the Israeli-Palestinian peace process.

The Arab League, meanwhile, dismissed the government's pledge as "worthless."

Olmert opposes freeze

The government could still seize land for roads or other public works, an aide to Rabin said.

Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Olmert vowed the expropriation of land would continue. He blasted the government decision to freeze expropriations, calling it "miserable."

However, city officials admitted there is little the municipality could do, as expropriations require federal government approval.

Under Israeli zoning laws, Arabs can build on no more than half of land Israel annexed after the 1967 war.

Some 400,000 Jews and 155,000 Palestinians live in Jerusalem. The city's status is scheduled to be discussed by the two sides in 1996.

Unity next big item on Jewish agenda: Burg

By LEORA FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

JERUSALEM — "Can the Jewish people survive without an enemy? This is the most important question of the next century," said Jewish Agency chair Avraham Burg last week during a meeting with a Toronto leadership delegation of the United Israel Appeal (UIA) of Canada.

"It's very easy to feel oneness when you have a threat," said Burg. But within a decade Israel will live in peace, he said. "Then we will have to ask ourselves what connects us as Jews.

"The most urgent mission facing the Jewish people is saving Jewish communities in distress," he said, adding that within a decade this will be largely accomplished.

Once the remaining Jews from the Commonwealth of Independent States are brought to Israel, there will be only small pockets of Jews in distress around the world, he said. Until now, Israeli and North American Jews have worked together to save those Jews. But with the success of this mission, Israeli and North American Jews will be forced to find new grounds for cooperation.

"We will have to begin a dialogue of a new kind," said Burg.

One of the main purposes of the Toronto delegation was to begin such a dialogue. "There is a growing sense of apartness," said Judy Gwartz, co-chair of the mission. "We're here to look for ways to bring Israeli and Diaspora Jewry closer together."

During the meeting, Burg criticized Israeli President Ezer Weizman's attitude towards the Jewish Diaspora. "He negates your existence," said Burg. "I don't think we can afford to negate anyone. Our enemy is assimilation."

Burg was also skeptical about a proposal made by Deputy Foreign Minister Yossi Beilin to provide vouchers enabling all North American Jewish youth to spend six weeks in Israel.

"I don't think that a six-week Israel experience can balance the 18 years of non-Jewish aspects in one's upbringing," he said.

Burg bemoaned the steady decrease in funds raised by the UIA and UJA (which make up most of the Agency's budget).

"In my first five weeks in office, I had to cut $30 million from the budget approved only a couple of months ago," he said. "I had to do this because your side is not meeting its promises. It's impossible for me to adjust my activities every three months because of the inability of the other side to raise funds."

Julia Koschitzky, chair of the world board of trustees of UIA, agreed with Burg. "How can the Jewish Agency be fiscally responsible when it has to guess what amount of money it will get every few months?"

Steve Ain, executive vice-president of UIA-Canada, said the organization would push for a three- to five-year guaranteed allocation to Israel in its upcoming fundraising campaign.

Vets touched by Dutch people's gratitude

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

APELDOORN, Holland — For Lionel Mernick of Toronto walking among the 6,000 other Canadian veterans and taking the salute from Princess Margriet in the "parade of the liberators" was especially meaningful: he carried Israel's flag.

About 40 members of the Wingate Branch of the Royal Canadian Legion in Toronto marched as a separate unit in this event, the highlight of Holland's display of gratitude to the heroism of Canadian soldiers.

They carried Israel's flag, along with the Canadian and Ontario flags, because it is part of the branch's official colors. Some in the crowd noticed the Jewish symbol and asked what it meant. "They were surprised to know that Jews were among the soldiers who liberated their country, even members of the Jewish community here," said participant Sol Raibmon.

"We're overwhelmed; we can't tell you how beautiful it is," said Sam Romberg, the branch's president, as he led the unit.

An unidentified Canadian veteran waves to crowds in a memorial day parade in Amsterdam. And (inset) Lionel Mernick of Toronto's Wingate Branch of the Legion carries Israel's flag in the parade of the liberators in Apeldoorn.

For Sam Ross, who was wounded in Holland while serving with the Royal Hamilton Light Infantry, the genuine emotion from the Dutch somehow made it seem worthwhile so many years later.

An estimated 300,000 lined the parade route through this small town, many staking out their place two hours before it began. They clapped and constantly shouted "thank you" along the route. Young and old, they shook hands, had their pictures taken with the vets, threw flowers and candy, asked for autographs and pins. Girls would run onto the street and dance with an elderly gent.

'Welcome again, liberators'

The streets were filled with Maple Leafs and banners proclaiming "Thank you, boys" and "Welcome again, liberators." Astonishingly, their enthusiasm did not flag, even though the parade lasted almost three hours under an unseasonably hot sun.

There were not only "boys" in the Wingate delegation. Reva Wolfson, who was a nurse with the Canadian Army medical corps, was among the marchers. She was stationed in England.

"It's been thrilling and exhilarating; we've had a rousing reception," she said at the end of the long route, sipping water in an army tent, before she boarded a bus for the four-hour trip back to the home near the Belgian border where she was billeted.

Ironically, near the end of the route there is an Israeli restaurant with prominent Hebrew lettering. Its owner, Israeli expatriate Asher Nidam living in Holland 23 years, was surprised to see his native country's flag go by. He offered any tired veteran falafel on the house.

He and his Dutch-born wife Gerda are among the youngest members of Apeldoorn's Jewish community of about 25 families. The synagogue is still open there, but used only on special occasions. For regular services, the 100 or so Jewish families in the area attend the synagogue in Arnhem.

While in Holland, some of the members toured the Canadian war cemeteries seeking out the Jewish graves and saying Kaddish, said veteran Oscar Adler.

Surprisingly, part of the Kaddish was sung during the national annual memorial service held in Amsterdam's Nieuwe Kerk, the huge cathedral next to the royal palace on the main square. The service was attended by Queen Beatrix and the 1,500 who were able to get one of the coveted tickets.

The guest speaker, writer Mies Bouhuys, talked at length about the lessons of the Holocaust and quoted from The Diary of Anne Frank. She warned against forgetting the past and lamented the fact that 50 years later wars with racist motivations are still fought.

The Week in Israel

May 8:

• Prime Minister ended his visit to Washington with a series of meetings with top American congressional leaders. In response to reporters' questions about a possible move of the American Embassy to Jerusalem, Rabin said: "Israel will always warmly welcome the move of any embassy to Jerusalem, however we will not get involved in any domestic discussions on how to do it."

May 9:

• The IDF told Israel Radio more civil responsibilities in the areas of trade, industry, fuel, insurance and mail will soon be transferred to the Palestinians in the West Bank.

• Yediot Aharonot reported Greenpeace activists had prevented an Israeli ship from disposing hundreds of tons of wastewater off the coast of Haifa. The incident was Greenpeace's first activity in Israel.

May 10:

• Major General Yoram Ya'ir has been appointed to be the Military Attache to the United States.

• Yediot Aharonot reported Tehran has been training Palestinian terrorists at camps in Iran. Quoting a senior American official, the U.S. has information directly linking Iran to the Beit Lid bombings.

• IDF First Sergeant Yevgeny Gellerman was killed in southern Lebanon in a night-time exchange of fire. According to Kol Yisrael, Gellerman may have died from friendly fire.

May 11:

• Itamar Rabinovich, Israel's Ambassador to the U.S., denied reports that Israel had agreed to a new American proposal aimed at bridging the gaps in the talks with Syria. Rabinovich and his Syrian counterpart, Walid Mualem, are trying to reach an agreement to present to Farouq a-Shara, Syrian Foreign Minister, when he visits Washington next week.

May 12:

• Contrary to front page stories in many of Israel's dailies, Religious Affairs Minister Shimon Shitreet told the army radio Galei Zahal that Israel will not expropriate land belonging to the Roman Catholic Cremisan monastery situated on a hill between Gilo and Bethlehem. Shitreet explained if land were to be expropriated, it would only do so after obtaining the consent of the church leaders.

PLO opposes embassy move to Jerusalem

Al-Kidwa also warned that any successful transfer of the U.S. embassy would be challenged at the UN and in the International Court of Justice.

The PLO envoy referred to the embassy issue at the opening debate of another political firestorm: the Israeli plan to expropriate about 140 acres of Arab land in eastern Jerusalem.

Despite stiff opposition from the White House and State Department, Senate majority leader and presidential hopeful Robert Dole has asked Congress for money to begin building a new embassy in Jerusalem next year.

Dole introduced legislation last week that would force the State Department to move the embassy from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem before May 31, 1999. The bill states that construction must begin before the end of 1996.

And Newt Gingrich, Speaker of the House of Representatives, said last week he will join Dole in leading the way on the issue.

As of last week, 20 Republican senators and just two Democrats had signed on to the Dole bill.

The move is seen as controversial because it would mean that work on a new embassy would begin before the final status of Jerusalem is determined.

Israel and the PLO are scheduled to begin negotiations on final status issues next year, including the fate of Jerusalem, and to finish the talks by 1999.

Although the U.S. ambassador would not move from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem until the status of Jerusalem is resolved in those negotiations, the construction "would be a symbolic gesture supporting a unified Jerusalem under Israeli control," said one congressional aide familiar with the proposal.

Dole unveiled his proposal last week before some 2,500 participants, powerbrokers and dignitaries attending the annual banquet of the American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC).

"What are we waiting for?" he asked the cheering crowd.

The latest effort goes one step beyond a letter 93 senators sent to Secretary of State Warren Christopher last month calling on Washington to move its embassy to Jerusalem at the end of the final status talks. More than 260 members of the House have signed a similar letter.

The embassy would likely be built on a parcel of land in western Jerusalem that the United States bought last year.

In other developments last week:

- PLO leader Yasser Arafat attacked the Dole proposal, saying, "These latest attempts to move the American embassy to Jerusalem are dangerous and in violation of previous U.S. administration decisions."
- Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin told reporters after meeting U.S. President Bill Clinton that the issue was not discussed. But Rabin said the location of the U.S. embassy does not affect Israel's claim to Jerusalem.
- The Clinton administration launched a full-court press to keep Democratic senators from signing on to the bill, saying the legislation "will have a devastating impact on the peace process."
- Gingrich delivered a blunt message to Arabs who object to the move: Grow up.

In a speech to the AIPAC banquet, Gingrich said: "I'm told that if we were to move the embassy there tomorrow, this would cause enormous unrest among those neighbors that would like to destroy Israel. Well, I'm frankly not sympathetic to that.

"We need to send a simple signal to the Middle East: The dominant power on the planet, the leader of the world, is committed unequivocally to the survival of Israel, and we will take those steps that are necessary to work with the free people of Israel to assure their survival."

- In Israel, a weekend opinion poll found that 58 per cent of respondents approved transferring the embassy, 35 per cent were opposed and seven per cent had no opinion.

HU to honor Kohl

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — The Hebrew University of Jerusalem plans to name its new institute for European studies after German Chancellor Helmut Kohl.

Israel's ambassador to Germany, Avi Primor, said last Friday that the gesture was to thank Kohl for his long support of Israel. Primor said Kohl deserved special merit for helping win "privileged status" for Israel in its relations with the European Union at last year's EU summit in Essen.

"It was a huge present for Israel," Primor told the Reuters news agency on a day of celebrations marking 30 years of diplomatic relations between the two countries.

Kohl is due to visit Israel next month.

Neo-Nazis suspected in cemetery vandalism

FRANKFURT — A Jewish cemetery in the central German town of Goettingen was desecrated last week, police said Sunday. Eleven gravestones were overturned and some were broken, apparently by neo-Nazis.

Damage was estimated at the equivalent of about $50,000 Canadian.

The incident was first reported by a cemetery caretaker last Friday and may be connected to telephone calls received earlier in the week by two local Protestant churches. Callers repeated Nazi slogans and threatened to vandalize the Jewish cemetery in Goettingen, about 200 km northeast of Frankfurt.

RA bans discrimination

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — Ten years after the Conservative movement ordained its first female rabbi, rabbis in the movement have passed a resolution rejecting discrimination against their female colleagues.

The resolution, passed May 8 at the 95th annual convention of the Rabbinical Assembly (RA), acknowledges discrimination against female rabbis, including less pay for equal work.

The resolution rejects "any attempts at gender discrimination" and instructs the RA's Joint Placement Commission "to provide equal access employment, to address the issue when raised by congregational members and to take appropriate action" when necessary.

Appropriate action outlined in the resolution includes:

- Endorsing a policy calling for equal pay for men and women in comparable positions;
- Producing and disseminating educational material for congregations on the status of female rabbis;
- Monitoring placement practices to ensure that no pattern of gender discrimination takes place.

The convention, held last week at the Concord Hotel at Lake Kiamesha, N.Y., included a special ceremony on the opening night of the gathering to honor a decade of women as rabbis.

"We seek the same respect, rights, privileges and an equal hearing for our male and female colleagues," said Rabbi Joel Meyers, executive vice-president of the RA.

This year's class of rabbis ordained by the Jewish Theological Seminary will include 11 women, bringing the total number of female Conservative rabbis to 71.

The issue of women as rabbis has long been discomfiting to Conservative rabbis in Canada, who are seen as being to the right of their American colleagues.

In Ontario especially, the RA has been dormant for months and may soon be replaced with an active wing of the Union for Traditional Judaism, founded in 1983 — the same year Conservatives began ordaining women — to bring more conservatism to the Conservative movement.

Hershon elected CJC president

Congress' new legal counsel Keith Landy promised a full review of election procedures before the next plenary.

The election campaign was marked by allegations of impropriety on both sides. The Hecht team was criticized for paying the registration fees of some supporters, especially young people, while the Hershon team was denounced for allegedly maligning Hecht's integrity in the media.

Hecht had the public support of an impressive list of community leaders and his campaign appeared to have the momentum.

Hershon said her priorities are national unity, small Jewish communities in Canada, fighting anti-Semitism and racism and involving the young in Congress.

She voted to "let the separatists know in no uncertain terms that Canadian Jewry stands for a united Canada," an apparent reference to Hecht's perceived ambiguity on federalism.

In another swipe at her opponent, an outspoken Likudnik, Hershon said, "Every door is open to me in Israel because I am not perceived as allied with one political party."

Films offer new dimension to Jewish civilization

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

It's a measure of the popularity of Toronto's 3-year-old Jewish Film Festival that, according to director Debra Plotkin, "We sold 200 passes to the festival without anyone knowing what the program was."

Another measure of the festival's success are the long line ups outside the Bloor Cinema before each screening.

Each day during the week-long festival, a lone fiddler pacifies the crowds with the familiar strains of Russian and Hungarian Jewish melodies, not to mention Fiddler On The Roof. Parking spots on local streets seem especially hard to come by and neighborhood restaurants do a booming business.

"I look forward to coming to the festival every year," said Paul Pascal, a ticketholder who was first in line for the Sunday afternoon screening of the 1993 Mexican film Like A Bride.

"I think that Jewish films are an additional and unexpected dimension of Jewish civilization. As opposed to going to synagogue or Zionism, here is a whole new expression of Jewish identity."

Standing beside Pascal in line as she did several years ago at the marriage altar, Ruth Rohm said she found she could relate personally to many aspects of Mina Tannenbaum, the 1993 French film that opened the festival.

"I found it very evocative and very emotionally rich. As a woman, I felt that it really captured a lot of the psychological realities of being a Jewish daughter, being a friend, having relationships with men and being judged on one's appearance.

lawyer.

The public's response to the festival has been highly positive, according to festival producer Helen Zukerman. Every day of the festival, attendees were invited to comment by filling in questionnaires.

"Some of the things that people write on the questionnaires are so achingly beautiful," she said. "Some people are so touched by some of the films, it's almost a verification of some of their deepest feelings. Especially Holocaust survivors, because a lot of them are silent about so many things, and then they see it in a film.

"Many people write about their sense of community and the sense of belonging that they experience during the week of the festival," she said.

Eye on Arts

by Bill Gladstone

Jewish Film Festival: Author Frederic Morton, who was in Toronto for the Jewish Film Festival last week, told Eye On Arts an interesting legend regarding his native city of Vienna, where he was born in 1925. The story goes that Kara Mustafa, the Turkish military leader, carried with him three stone talismans from Jerusalem when his army attacked Vienna in 1683. One was a stone from the Church of the Nativity, another a stone from Dome of the Rock, the third a brick from the Western Wall of the Second Temple.

According to this legend, Mustafa took two of the talismans with him when the Turks were repelled, leaving behind the brick from the Western Wall. Two centuries later, when Morton's grandfather became a successful factory owner and bought up a whole street in an eastern section of Vienna, the old man came to believe that he possessed his own personal Jerusalem "because the brick of the Western Wall was there," Morton explains. "The street where I was born, and where my family still owns two buildings, was very near the headquarters of Mustafa."

Based on his family's experiences in Vienna over several generations, Morton's novel The Forever Street elaborates on this legend. The novel begins when his grandfather first came to Vienna at the age of 15 during the first World Exposition, and ends on the day of the Anschluss, when Austria was absorbed into Germany in 1938. The Forever Street is going to be made into a film early next year, Morton said.

In the early '60s, Morton wrote a bestselling study of the Rothschilds, which was later made into a Broadway musical and remounted in New York and Miami in recent years. His 1979 book A Nervous Splendor remains one of the best books on events of 1888 and 1889 leading up to the suicide of Crown Prince Rudolf at Mayerling. A follow-up book, Thunder and Twilight, focuses on events of 1913-14, from the assassination of Austrian archduke Franz Ferdinand to the opening of World War I. According to Morton, shooting begins next year for a two-hour television movie based on this work.

Gold-Plated Chaplin: The Canadian Film Centre presents Charlie Chaplin's classic 1925 film The Gold Rush, which tells the story of a lone prospector seeking fame and fortune in the mad rush for hidden gold in the Yukon. The screening is a fundraising event for the centre, and includes a special guest introduction by Douglas Fairbanks, Jr. Tickets are $250.

The event takes place at the George Weston Recital Hall, Ford Centre for the Performing Arts, North York, June 1, 8 p.m., with a champagne reception at Windfields, the Bayview Avenue home of the centre. Shmoozing in the lobby Between screenings, film-goers stand elbow to elbow in the theatre lobby and chat.

"I'm very satisfied with the wide range of films," said Avi Hyman, a communications specialist. "And I'm glad to see such a wide range of people, including many who wouldn't normally participate in events within the mainstream Jewish community. I think the festival is a great model for other events."

"I think it's very appropriate that the films are very different, and I hope they reach a very diverse audience," said Heidi Shuster, a

Admitting The Holocaust by Lawrence L. Langer, Oxford University Press ($34.50)

The time has come, asserts Prof. Lawrence Langer, for us to come to terms with the Holocaust — frankly and unflinchingly.

Even after 50 years we find it difficult to confront the stark evil that was Nazi Germany. Perhaps the terrible truth shatters our need for mental self-preservation. How can we acknowledge a world deprived of ethical force, in which raw power supplants human concern, and in which indifference to suffering prevails over compassion?

Admitting the Holocaust is a book of 11 essays by a respected scholar and teacher.

Its main concern is to remove false labels from the Holocaust experience, as well as such terms as dignity, triumph or martyrdom when referring to its victims.

After all, said the author in a recent interview, "There is nothing dignified in standing by while 10 members of your family are killed, and there's nothing triumphant about staying alive when you're powerless to help the people you love to stay alive."

In the essay The Americanization of the Holocaust on Stage and Screen, Langer discusses the popularity of the play based on the diary of Anne Frank.

Anne Frank

He sees the play's popularity stemming from the inclusion of Anne's words: "In spite of everything, I still believe that people are really good at heart."

But, Langer writes, "the authors of the dramatic version of Anne Frank's diary lacked the artistic will — or courage — to leave their audiences overwhelmed by the feeling that Anne's bright spirit was extinguished, that Anne, together with millions of others, was killed simply because she was Jewish, and for no other reason."

Langer wonders why a writer like Bernard Malamud, in whose work the themes of suffering and dignity are so closely allied, has touched only peripherally on the Holocaust. Perhaps, he suggests, because the sheer irrationality of the atrocities run counter to Malamud's desire to portray circumstances that allow people to achieve their full human potential.

The television drama Holocaust, shown 17 years ago to much fanfare and acclaim, Langer says was flawed because it portrayed "well groomed and sanitized men and women filing into the gas chambers." But he applauds the recent film, Schindler's List, for its realistic portrayal of the fear that consumed the concentration camp victims as well as the ruthless and impulsive cruelty of their captors.

So, concludes Langer, there should be no attempt to sweeten or mitigate the horror.

"The need to make the Holocaust appear more harmless than it was has many roots and hence many branches, leaves and blossoms. Efforts to sweeten the bitter fruits of mass murder will have to be monitored for decades, and perhaps generations, if we are to prevent what happened from slipping into a vague limbo of forgetfulness."

Community troupe to perform Tevye

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Dr. Harvey Cooperberg

TORONTO — Sholom Aleichem's Tevye, his wife and five daughters will soon come to life in Aurora, Ont.

The Hilltop Musical Theatre Company, a non-profit community theatre company based in Richmond Hill, will present Fiddler on the Roof at St. Andrew's College, 15800 Yonge St. in Aurora, with evening performances from May 24 to 27 at 8 p.m., and a matinee on May 28 at 3 p.m.

One of the world's most unforgettable musicals, Fiddler documents the changing world of the Jews of Anatevka, who faced pogroms and the breakdown of the old ways of life. A deightful show for both young and old, it was originally directed and choregographed by Jerome Robbins and produced by Harold Prince in New York.

In the Hilltop production, Tevye will be played by Markham dentist, Dr. Harvey Cooperberg, a tenor-soloist who grew a beard for the role.

Cooperberg, who has performed in musicals in Toronto, Montreal and Philadelphia, was recently elected president of Alpha Omega Dental Fraternity. He said the May 25 performance is an Alpha Omega fundraiser. The proceeds will go to the Jewish Family & Child Service for people who cannot afford dental care.

Eva Ivanov, who has directed more than 30 amateur and professional productions, is the director and Lorne Derraugh is the music director. A cast of 42 and a number of other volunteers handle costume design, technical work and fundraising.

The Hilltop Musical Theatre was founded in 1979, said Cathy Calligaro, the producer, who has worked with amateur groups for four years. Based in Richmond Hill, the group is involved with arts in York Region through the Arts Council of Richmond Hill, including Heritage Village Day and local festivities. They also perform for local seniors groups and at other community events.

Calligaro said membership is open to anyone in the Toronto area, although most of the members are from York Region. The company operates through donations from local residents and businesses.

"Without reservation, I am proud to be associated with this group of hard working, enthusiastic people," said Hilltop president Lorraine Wilson.

Tickets are $10 for students and seniors, $15 for adults. For tickets and more information, call 905-884-6625.

Classic Chanel

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

It was standing room only at the Chanel Boutique when the 1995 spring-summer ready-to-wear collection was presented.

An estimated 160 well-heeled shoppers came out to the boutique, which opened in Toronto six years ago, to watch models strut the catwalk wearing the latest designs by Chanel designer Karl Lagerfeld.

"He makes Chanel young," said Barbara Mauro, assistant manager of the boutique. "No matter what colors, no matter what he's done, it's still classic Chanel."

This spring Lagerfeld is showing cropped or fitted jackets, rhinestone accessories and sequined tweed suits.

The fashion show opened with a cropped cotton tweed jacket, trimmed with black lacquered straw edging worn with a rhinestone belt over a high-waisted corseted wool crepe skirt with a high front slit.

There are variations of the cropped jacket — long and short sleeve, round or v-neck and with or without a collar — available in a variety of colors.

Fancy tweed suits — sequins are added to the day wear — are featured this spring. "This is a new treatment for sequins," Mauro said. "They're not strictly for evening."

Little evening wear was shown at the spring fashion show. There were some black wool crepe cocktail dresses and jump suits, and a black chiffon ankle length dress with horizontal ruffles and pleating.

Brightly-colored bathing suits, some sequined, were shown with rhinestone jewelry. Other spring accessories included patent leather, heart-shaped bags, a jersey headband and plastic camellias.

The philosophy at Chanel is anything goes — black and navy, and sequined jackets over walking shorts. "You can do anything you want depending on your confidence," Mauro said.

The Chanel show opened with a collection of cropped cotton tweed jackets, and high - wasted corsetted wool crepe skirt with high a front slit.

Gowns need long lead time

Even though June brides have just weeks to go before they walk down the aisle, Maria Arrigo, vice-president of Alan Cherry Bridal, is already doing fittings for weddings taking place in fall '95 and spring '96.

"If brides want their dresses to be perfect, they should order them at least six months in advance," Arrigo said "Our dresses come from all over the world and much of the detailing on them – the beading, lace and embroidery – is done by hand and is very time consuming."

The intricate artistry of the dresses combined with the fact that shortages of materials, especially lace, can occur all add to the long lead time.

Once the dress finally arrives in Toronto, there is still more work to be done. "Sleeves, waistlines and necklines often need to be altered, which can also take a lot of time," said Arrigo. "Planning ahead also saves on rush changes."

In most cases, wedding dresses are altered by the bridal salon. Alan Cherry Bridal has a team of professional seamstresses that ensure the dress fits perfectly. Having a long lead time also leaves lots of time for the finishing touches – veils, headpieces, shoes and jewelry.

This white silk shantung, short cap with silk roses, beaded alencon lace bodice, basque waistline with asymmetrical back overskirt is one of Alan Cherry Bridal's latest gowns.

While wedding dresses don't follow traditional fashion trends, Arrigo has seen major shifts in style. "The '80s was the 'Oh my G-d' dress – big and beaded," Arrigo said. "The early '90s shifted to the 'Wow!' dress. Today, brides are buying the 'me' dress – sophisticated, elegant dresses that focus on the bride."

Alan Cherry Bridal, located in Hazelton Lanes on Avenue Road in Toronto, features a large selection of merchandise from New York, Paris, Italy, London and Spain. The store carries all wedding accessories, including veils, headpieces, shoes and jewelry. Wedding gowns are also available in plus sizes and petites.

Mom's dresses inspired designer

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Sunny Choi was one of Canada's top fashion illustrators when she decided to make a career change and go from drawing to designing clothes 12 years ago.

Today Choi is one of the best-known Canadian designers. She told The CJN recently that becoming a clothing designer was a natural evolution for her.

"I felt that painting could wait, but there was only a certain age when I could become a clothing designer," she says.

Growing up in Korea, Choi made her own clothes, but says her love of fashion came from her mother, who as the wife of an ambassador required an extensive wardrobe. "I still remember every outfit my mother wore. Those dresses inspired me."

Choi began her new career designing costumes for the National Ballet of Canada and couture pieces for Fidani, a Yorkville boutique.

She made beautiful clothing but she did not know anything about marketing, she said. "I completely bombed in business. I used up all my money ... but Jack Atkin rescued me."

Atkin, a successful clothing manufacturer who had worked with Marc Jacobs and Wayne Clarke, became Choi's business partner six years ago.

"He loved the collection," she said. "He knew I was a mess in business. He said, 'I'll take care of the business and you design.' "

Choi said her clothing is designed to flatter the women who wear them. She works to create pieces that are stylish, elegant, with clean simple lines and a lot of attention paid to detail and finishing. She even designs her own buttons.

Prices range from $225 to $550 for dresses and $450 to $650 for suits in Canada. In the United States, Choi sells evening wear — suits retail from $800 to $1,000 (US) — to upscale retailers like Bergdorf Goodman, Nordstroms and Nieman-Marcus.

Choi and Atkin set up 11 "fashion houses" across Canada to sell directly to the public at reduced prices. Visits are by appointment only.

Signature scents launched

By CAROL WISE
Special to The CJN

There wasn't a detail left undone and the atmosphere filled with wafts of the most tantalizing scent, very much like vanilla.

French bad boy couturier Jean Paul Gaultier's first signature fragrance was recently launched with great fanfare at all 12 Holt Renfrew stores in Canada.

The brilliant and non-conformist fashion designer has shown his provocative collections since 1976. He is most renowned for designing Madonna's bullet-cone bra and for putting men in skirts.

The perfume includes vanilla to satisfy his earlier desire to become a pastry chef. "I wanted to create a scent that makes you want to eat the person in front of you," he said.

Perfume bottle a work of art

The bottle itself is a work of art. The curvaceous glass woman is reminiscent of the zaftig statues found in ancient tombs. "What woman doesn't have a tummy?," Gaultier asks. The bottle is packaged in a shiny can.

Gaultier sees the women that wear his scent as young, very young, not so young, blond, brunette, auburn. "Let's just say this woman is every woman," he says.

Prices range from $66 for a 50-ml bottle of eau de toilette to $190 for a 30-ml perfume at Holt Renfrew.

Beauty SHOP

By CAROL WISE

It is not just a coincidence that we are more health and beauty conscious through the summer months. It is a fact.

As those shorts and T-shirts come out of the closet you realize that extra five pounds has to go.

Wake up 30 minutes earlier and have a brisk walk and maybe do 50 sit ups. Be sure to get your heart rate up to increase your circulation and strengthen your heart and respiratory muscles. Aerobic exercise should be done for a minimum of 20 minutes to help burn fat, according to the "Wellness Doctor," Dr. Jim Meschino. Work your muscles to tone and increase strength.

A low-fat diet will also help you achieve your goal. Eat lots of fruit and vegetables and remember being healthy and fit is a lot more rewarding than any double-chocolate cream pie. Try supplementing your diet with a good multiple vitamin. Your body will function better when you feed it properly, like putting gas in your car. "I'll take supreme please."

It is equally important to protect your skin from harmful rays of the sun with a number 15 SPF. I know a suntan looks and feels great, but try a tan in a bottle — they are sexy, safe and everyone is using them.

With the increased humidity in the air your skin is less likely to be dehydrated, so it is best to use a lightly formulated moisturizer. Your heavy winter creams might cause unwanted blemishes. The warm temperatures can also clog pores, so it is imperative to cleanse your skin thoroughly, and follow with a skin refresher to suit your skin type. This regimen should be done morning and night. Never go to sleep with your makeup on!

Makeup this summer will be fresh and colorful. For the first time this decade, we are taking a step away from the doldrums of brown, brown and more brown. And remember: less is definitely more through the summer months. There is nothing more unattractive than gaudy makeup on a hot summer day.

Summertime is a time for fun and relaxation. Below is a list of new products and helpful tips to help you look great and enjoy the summer months.

SKIN

ULTIMA II has developed a new foundation, Wonderware, and the wonderful news is that it stays on for about 18 hours, has a SPF 6 and is waterproof. So if you are tempted to dive into that refreshing swimming pool, go for it.

DERMA BLEND, one of the best camouflage products on the market, is launching their new lighter textured foundation early this summer. Packaged in an easy to carry compact, this gorgeous cream contains a full sun block, is waterproof and will give you great coverage while still looking fresh and natural.

ESTEE LAUDER's Enlighten. This skin-enhancing makeup is perfect for women and teens who want makeup that feels like wearing no makeup at all. Oil free, it is great for sensitive skin and provides natural looking coverage. It contains a buffer zone of BHT and vitamins C and E along with a sun block to provide excellent protection against environmental pollutants and the harsh rays of the sun.

NEUTROGENA Glow. Sunless tanning lotion for the face is a great alternative to sunbathing. This highly moisturizing lotion works with most skin tones. It is available in two shades, Light Glow or Deep Glow, for a lovely tan without suffering the consequences of the sun.

ESTEE LAUDER Skin Perfection Lotion. This daily moisturizer is lightweight and keeps the skin feeling fresh and comfortable. A rapidly absorbed lotion that provides extended moisturizing benefits, then goes many degrees beyond to improve the skin.

VITAMINS

Where are vitamins and minerals most beneficial, taken internally or applied externally? I say, do both. For a daily multivitamin, Nu-Life seems to be one of the better ones on the market.

FITNESS

It's the '90s and a sedentary lifestyle is simply not an option. "Health and wellness depend greatly on fitness. Exercise is not just to get your body in shape, it is to feel better, relieve stress and often will prevent illness," says Dr. Meschino.

HAIR

Regularly condition your hair, as the sun can cause it to look dry and frizzy. If your hair is colored, try to protect it with a hat. Hair designer Daniel Fiorio says "the spotlight is on shine to emphasize hair shape and cut. Shapes are clean, polished and simple, but not simplistic, with a nod to the glamor girls of the '30s, '40s and '50s."

BODY/HAND

NEUTROGENA Glow sunless tanning sprays for the body, in light and deep glow shades, are designed to deliver a fine, even mist without streaking. An even all-over tan develops in two to four hours.

EYES

ESTEE LAUDER Resilience Eye Cream is a unique marriage of advanced skin care and the art of illusion. Right before your eyes, lines become less visible and in just weeks your skin will appear firmer and smoother looking.

ULTIMA II introduces new Eyesexxxy eyeliner. This precision pencil with twist-up tip always delivers the finest line. It goes on smoothly and sets to stay for up to eight hours.

LIPS

ESTEE LAUDER's new Double Lip Gloss has a non-paba sunscreen, vitamin E and BHT to provide total protection against UV light and everyday pollutants. Look out for this super gloss at your cosmetic counter in early July.

ULTIMA II Lipsexxxy lip color offers you a kissable lipstick that stays put for an unbelievably long time. It won't bleed, feather, smear or stain. Available in 16 colors.

Salon pampers its clients

By SYLVIA PAPERNICK
Special to the CJN

With a brushstroke and a powder puff, Featuring ...You Spa and Salon transforms one more beautiful bride for her wedding day. The full service salon recently celebrated 10 years of the best in beauty care, always using the most current products and techniques.

Mary Orlando, manager and owner said the salon is now introducing more body and skin care treatments to meet customer demand.

"More and more clients were asking for massage and body treatments," she said. The salon has two estheticians to offer aromatherapy sessions in full body, foot and hand treatments. One can also indulge in a private, relaxing, shiatsu or Swedish massage. The salon serves men and women.

Hard-working hands can be pampered with a manicure. There is an extensive selection of types to choose from, including paraffin manicures, heated mitt manicures and new Nailtiques manicures. Created in Florida, this therapeutic nailcare treatment is customized to each person's needs.

With the abundance of glycolic creams and treatments currently available, Orlando used her own face to experiment with to find the best product.

"My face went through hell," she said, adding some products did nothing and some burned her. Recently the salon introduced the glycolic line of Murad products which, unlike other glycolic creams, does not disrupt one's regular skincare regime.

The menu of beauty treatments available is extensive. It includes sunless tanning treatments, ear-piercing, electrolysis and a beauty checkup that assesses a client's cosmetics for unnecessary or undesirable products. Waxing is followed by an application of soothing tea tree oil, a soothing lotion which minimizes the redness after waxing.

Cellulite treatments and pedicure and leg treatments stimulate circulation and can be done simultaneously.

"Eveyone's so stressed out lately," Orlando said. "We're trying to incorporate more services in less time."

All tools are sterilized before, during and after treatment.

Featuring...You Spa and Salon does hair and makeup packages for the entire bridal party. Last year the spa did 183 bridal parties in nine months. Makeup for the bride today, Orlando said, is "a much more relaxed look" with natural colors. Each bride begins creating her look with a half-hour complimentary consultation for her hair and makeup, and the makeup colors chosen are charted for future reference. On the wedding day, the bridal party can come to the salon to be made up, or be made up on location.

New to the salon is hairdresser Louis Zeppieri, who brings with him 18 years of experience in hairstyling. He creates lovely brides, with a soft look or one that uses a lot of ringlets and barrel curls on top – a very high elegant look. Hair and dress should co-ordinate to achieve the desired look, whether it's romantic or traditional.

Located at 1106 Eglinton Ave. W, Featuring...You Spa and Salon can be reached at 416-783-7793.

Mud, minerals rejuvenate

Melanie La Rue may represent the youth component of Oris Dead Sea Products of Canada, but the 22-year-old Montrealer is the first to admit Natural Sea Beauty products hold no age barrier.

"Our mud gels, toners, shampoos, bath salts, soaps, body lotions, foot creams, sun blocks, and mud masks are composed of natural salts and minerals from the Dead Sea in Israel. There is nothing artificial about it and the benefits apply to all ages," she says.

The Natural Sea Beauty line is the brainchild of Oris Israel chief biochemist Uri Reiss. The products were developed in a kosher laboratory using selected ingredients. Products are not tested on animals, nor do they contain animal fats.

The Dead Sea minerals found in Natural Sea products help in restoring and protecting the skin.

Natural Sea products are available at department stores and pharmacies across Canada, including The Bay, Holt Renfrew, Jean Coutu pharmacies and some Save on Foods stores in British Columbia.

Travel Talk

by Bill Gladstone

YIVO's Travels: YIVO head librarian Zachary Baker, who is giving several public lectures in Toronto later this month, has told Travel Talk that the well known Manhattan-based institute for Yiddish culture, which was established in Vilna in 1925, is currently operating out of a temporary location, as it prepares to move into its new headquarters at 15 W. 16th St. in about two years.

When it makes the move, YIVO will be sharing space within the new facility with three other noteworthy research institutes — the American Jewish Historical Society, the Leo Baeck Institute, and the Yeshiva University Museum. For many Canadian researchers who go to New York, this will be a "one-stop shop" for a wide variety of Jewish studies.

About five years ago, some of the archival material that YIVO lost to the Nazis, which was presumed to have been destroyed, resurfaced in the Lithuanian State Book Chamber, part of the Lithuanian National Library. After lengthy and difficult negotiations, Lithuanian officials allowed YIVO to borrow, copy and return the material, which consists of about 75 large archival boxes of YIVO institutional files, sheet music, photographs and other items of Lithuanian-Jewish provenance.

"We received about one-third to one-half of the boxes that were identified as YIVO property in February of this year, and this summer we expect to receive the remainder," said Baker.

Is Yiddish on the rebound? When asked this question, Baker acknowledged that Yiddish reading groups and classes have sprung up in a host of cities across North America, and that there is even a Yiddish discussion group called Mendele on the Internet.

"But the overall pool of speakers of the language has declined to a minimal point," he said. "The one area where you do see an increase of Yiddish speakers these days in in the chassidic sector, but the Chassidim of various sects have little to do with the Yiddish culture — literature, music, theatre, that sort of thing — that was built by our grandparents' generation."

Baker is scheduled to speak in Yiddish to the Yidishe Kultur Geselshaft at the Workmen's Circle, 471 Lawrence Ave. W., on Sunday May 28, 8 p.m. Admission is $3. He is also scheduled to speak in English at a meeting of the Jewish Genealogical Society of Canada, Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue, Monday May 29, 8 p.m. Admission is free.

While in town, he hopes to visit the Yiddish Panorama exhibit at the Robarts Library, U of T, which is on view until the end of May.

Mission to Israel and Jordan: Bar-Ilan University, which marks its 40th anniversary this year, is offering a VIP Tour of Israel and Jordan, June 6 to 15. Participants are scheduled to meet with leaders in both countries, learn more about the work of Bar-Ilan scientists and scholars, explore biblical sites on both sides of the river Jordan, and travel widely across Israel.

For more information, contact your local Canadian Friends of Bar-Ilan office — Jonathan Schneiderman at 514-731-7893 in Montreal, or Miriam Steinhouse at 905-660-3563 in Toronto. Exclusive Mission travel agent is David Freudmann of UniWorld Travel and Tours. Phone 416-493-3322 in Toronto or toll free 800-268-3159.

Save on Israel Hotels: Israel's Moriah Hotel chain is offering a summer savings program with rooms going for as little as $58 (US) per night, based on double occupancy. To qualify, one must stay at any of six Moriah hotels across the country for a minimum of nine nights. For shorter stays, slightly higher rates apply. All rates are subject to a 15 per cent service charge. Call 212-541-5009.

Guides to the perplexed

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

Summer, the most popular vacation season, is almost upon us. So if you're planning a trip abroad, you'd be wise to consult reputable guidebooks.

Here are several of the latest, which are bound to save you time and money:

•Scandinavian & Baltic Europe (Raincoast, $21.95) introduces a reader to the delights of Denmark, Estonia, Faroe Islands, Finland, Iceland, Kaliningrad (an enclave in Russia which once belonged to Germany), Latvia, Lithuania, Norway and Sweden.

•Czech & Slovak Republics (Raincoast, $19.95) provides insights about two countries attracting increasing attention from tourists. Sites of Jewish interest are included.

•Vienna (Raincoast, $12.95) is a handy, pocket-size compendium of a historic city tailor-made for strollers. Inside you'll also find information on the new Jewish Museum and the Sigmund Freud Museum. Clear maps and bright colored photographs enhance the value of this solid guide.

Study Tours (Raincoast, $17.95) cues you in on special tours offered by Canadian universities and colleges to 40 countries, including Israel. The trips run the gamut from archeological digs to whale watching.

THE SPRING MARKET AND YOUR HOME

By Paul F. Slavens
Manager-Broker, Paul Slavens Real Estate

This is the first in a series of columns by Paul F. Slavens, who has led the real estate company bearing his name for the last 26 years. He and his agents will be sharing their views with readers in the months to come.

Just like the flowers in gardens, For Sale signs are springing up all across Central and North Toronto. Some homes will move quickly and the owner will proudly show off the "Sold" sign in the front lawn. Owners are very proud of this sign, because it means that the goal of a lifestyle change or moving to another home will be achieved.

But what can one say of those properties that sit there month after month? The For Sale sign forlornly stares out on the front lawn, as though there is something wrong with the house. After 26 years in the real estate business, I can offer one insight about those signs and that is: it isn't always the fault of the property.

The RIGHT BROKER can — and does — make a difference. All brokers are not the same. The reason Paul Slavens Real Estate Limited has succeeded in delivering results in rising and falling markets comes down to one key point. We are owner-managed and operated and are dedicated to building an organization with key agents that are committed to us. Quite simply, we attract the BEST AGENTS. In addition, many younger sales representatives are choosing to make their careers at PAUL SLAVENS. That means the broadest mix of buyers can be tapped to look at your property, from established agents to those in touch with the "thirtysomething" market that is powering real estate sales in our marketplace.

In addition, my role is as MANAGER-BROKER and I do not compete against my representatives. Instead, my sole function is to lend my abilities, experience and prestige to help our agents negotiate a satisfactory sale. I am proud to state that I do not sell real estate directly: I help close deals. And making deals are what this business is all about.

Perhaps this spring, you are contemplating selling your home. You've heard some talk about the market, and it's been some time since you've had an updated opinion of the value of your property.

Here are several points to consider when selecting a BROKER: all of them are reasons you should call PAUL SLAVENS first.

Longevity: is there a proven track record behind the Real Estate Broker you are considering? How many years has the agency been in business? How many properties have they sold?

Owner/Manager: does the principal Broker sell, in competition with his own agents? Is there someone who can provide objective impartial analysis concerning your transaction?

Agents: are there experienced agents in the office? How long have they been with the company? The longer they stay with the company, the greater likelihood that they are successful producers.

Advice: have you been given a thorough look at your property, with insights on all of the many small items that make it sell quicker, and for a better price?

Price: is the price set realistic and are you knowledgeable about comparable sales in your area, determining whether your home is comparable or not to these other properties?

Mortgage financing: can your broker make the sale of your present property more attractive? and provide you with sources of funds for your next transaction?

If the answers to the above are not all in the affirmative, then you haven't talked to Paul Slavens. If you call Paul Slavens Real Estate and mention this column, a qualified representative will give you a free, no-cost, no-obligation property marketing evaluation.

In other news, we are pleased that RON BAKER, a specialist in Central and North Toronto real estate, has joined us as a Sales Representative after successfully marketing real estate in this city, for over 17 years.

Contrary to news reports in the media about a "slower market", we are proud to boast our sales in 1995 are up 25% over the last year.

RECENT PAUL SLAVENS LISTINGS THAT HAVE SOLD INCLUDE THE FOLLOWING:

15 ORMSBY CRESCENT
Call *BARBARA KAPLAN

37 STRATHEARN BLVD. - at 95% of the asking price.

DON WAGMAN

ASSOCIATE BROKER
SENIOR VICE-PRESIDENT
PAUL SLAVENS REAL ESTATE LIMITED

Don Wagman, a lifelong resident of Central Toronto, has been associated with Paul Slavens Real Estate for more than 21 years – a notable record of longevity and sucess. He attributes his lasting career to four important qualities: honesty, diligence, knowledge and experience. He can boast of several generations of clients who have come to rely on his abilities, including the children of families he first found homes for in the mid 70's. He believes that it's the small touches that often makes the sale, and helps his clients prepare their homes so they'll show better. To Don, every home is important. He has sold homes ranging from $150,000 to one of the most expensive homes sold in Forest Hill since the 1989 peak, at $3.5 million. His most unsual experience was when a happy client spilled champagne all over the sales contract and used a hair dryer to remedy the situation. Don's own personal philosophy about residential properities is that they are once again viewed by most people as a home, a shelter, a place for a family to grow and enjoy life, rather than just an investment. He firmly believes that after 25 years in business, Paul Slavens Real Estate still delivers the best results in the marketplace for his many clients. If you're thinking of buying or selling a home, call Don Wagman, Associate broker, at:

Hershon promises election reforms

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Newly elected Canadian Jewish Congress president Goldie Hershon promised to immediately form a task force to review and make recommendations to improve the organization's election procedures.

She called for a "time of healing" after the plenary, which left many delegates frustrated.

With 847 votes cast, Thomas Hecht lost to Hershon by just 16 votes, confirmed after a recount, although those results – established at about 4 a.m. – were never announced to delegates.

Hershon, who was chief returning officer for the federal Mount Royal riding and is familiar with electioneering, said Congress staff could simply not cope with the 300 to 400 people who came to register on the plenary's first day. The situation was exacerbated by a computer breakdown at one point.

Stories of people waiting up to six hours were rife, and prominent personality Sen. Leo Kolber (a Hecht supporter) never got to vote.

Any chartered Jewish group may send one delegate for every 250 members up to a maximum of four per region, plus one national representative, when applicable.

However, these rules become arguable in such cases as synagogues whose membership may be counted by families or individuals or in the case of the Canadian Zionist Federation, which has both at large and constituent memberships.

Hecht, however, saw himself as a victim of the process, hinting that Congress "insiders" deliberately obstructed some of his supporters. "I wanted to open Congress to all segments of Jewish life in Canada and thus bring about change, but Congress insiders opted for the status quo."

He insisted that busing in supporters from Toronto, many of them young people, and paying their

IRB reconsiders Law of Return

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canada's Immigration and Refugee Board (IRB) has squarely contradicted a decision last November that denied refugee status to a claimant from Azerbaijan on the grounds that as a Jew, she could go live in Israel.

In a May 2 written ruling, an IRB panel here granted refugee status to a Russian Jewish woman and at the same time, said Israel's 1950 Law of Return does not necessarily extend Israeli protection to all Jews.

An appeal of the November ruling will likely be heard by the Federal Court of Canada later this year.

Immigration lawyers and Jewish community officials are encouraged by the latest decision, which they say more accurately interprets the Law of Return as not automatically conferring Israeli citizenship on every Jew in the world.

IRB members Zulie Sachedina and John Hilborn granted refugee status to a 32-year-old claimant who pleaded that violent anti-Semitic attacks against her and her son in Russia made life unbearable.

Because the claimant is Jewish, the panel explored the Law of Return, which guarantees immediate Israeli citizenship to anyone Jew who moves to Israel and can prove one Jewish grandparent.

But it said the law "makes it clear that a desire to settle in Israel is a condition precedent to obtaining Israeli citizenship, and without that desire, Israel would not recognize a Jew as its citizen."

Israeli law, the panel wrote, not only requires expressed desire to settle there, "but also requires demonstration of such desire by actual immigration."

The panel pointed out that the woman and her family have no immediate relatives in Israel and no desire to live there. "The only connection they have with Israel is that they are Jews. We do not find that fact by itself is enough to make one an Israeli citizen."

Further, it added: "We do not find that all Jews have the connection with the State of Israel to make them nationals of Israel."

The woman's lawyer, Benjamin Kranc, told The CJN the decision recognizes that not all Jews want to or should live in Israel.

Kranc said the ruling will be "helpful" in the appeal of the earlier IRB decision, but the court will not be bound by it.

Last November's ruling angered many Jewish immigration officials for what they saw as a perverse twist to Canada's wartime "none is too many" policy of restricted immigration for Jews.

It said the applicant "can, as a right, obtain Israeli citizenship by a mere formality of application" because since she is a Jew, Israel is one of her countries of nationality.

For many, the earlier decision raised the question of whether Jews claiming persecution could make refugee claims in Canada at all.

The News In Brief

CANADA

Farber Man of Year

TORONTO — The Jewish Chautauqua Society this month honored Bernie Farber of Canadian Jewish Congress as its Interfaith Person of the Year.

The society, part of the National Federation of Temple Brotherhoods, paid tribute to Farber, national director of community relations for Congress, in recognition of his years of service to the community.

Secular Jewish Parley

TORONTO — Five secular Jewish leaders from Canada will present workshops at the 25th annual Conference of the Congress of Secular Jewish Organizations, May 26-28 at Concordia College in River Forest, Ill.

Expected from the Toronto-based Secular Jewish Association (SJA) are: SJA co-founder Jerald Bain; teen Michelle Monk; Yiddishist Gerry Kane; and certified leader Eva Goldfinger.

Soli Jackson of the Vancouver Peretz School will also present a session.

Also expected to attend are representatives from Toronto's Winchevsky School, Vancouver's Secular Jewish Network and Winnipeg's United Jewish People's Order Branch 16.

Book Wins Prize

VANCOUVER — Lillian Boraks-Nemetz, a child survivor of the Warsaw Ghetto, has been awarded the prestigious B.C. Book Prize for best children's book for her 1994 novel The Old Brown Suitcase.

In her acceptance speech at the awards gala this month, Boraks-Nemetz thanked her heroine, Slava, a 14-year-old hidden child who evades capture by the Nazis and makes her way to Canada.

The prize carried an award of $2,000.

ISRAEL

IDF Soldier Killed

JERUSALEM — An Israeli soldier was killed and three others wounded, one of them seriously, during fierce exchanges with gunmen in south Lebanon last Wednesday.

Staff Sgt. Amir Kara, 20, died from a direct hit by mortar rounds on an IDF outpost at Tel Dabsha in the eastern sector of the security zone. He is the fourth IDF soldier to be killed in action in south Lebanon this year.

More Chechens Arrive

TEL AVIV — A group of 52 refugees from war-torn Chechnya arrived here last week on a special flight organized by the Jewish Agency and funded by the Joint Israel Appeal of Great Britain.

The group included 19 children and several people injured in fighting with Russian forces.

The arrival brought to 103 the number of Chechen Jews who have been brought to Israel.

The Jewish Agency estimates there are still about 50 Jews left in the Chechen capital of Grozny.

Jerusalem Prize

JERUSALEM — The World Zionist Organization's Department for Torah Education and Culture in the Diaspora is to award its Jerusalem Prize for Excellence in Jewish Education May 28.

Recipients will include Rabbi Moshe Rahimi, a shaliach who has returned to Israel from Toronto's Ulpanat Orot Girls' School.

Also to receive the award is Rabbi Jonathan Saks, Chief Rabbi of Great Britain.

Baram Quits Post

JERUSALEM — Tourism and Interior Minister Uzi Baram last week informed Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin he is resigning the Interior post for personal reasons.

Baram, who took over the ministry three months ago, told Rabin he could not devote enough time to both ministries.

Kosher Big Macs

JERUSALEM — Hold the cheese on that Big Mac: McDonald's Israel last Tuesday announced plans to open the chain's first three kosher restaurants.

The outlets, in Rehovot, the Jerusalem suburb of Mevasseret Zion and Ra'anana, are expected to open before the end of this year.

No dairy products will be served and the restaurants will be closed on Shabbat. The menu will include a Big Mac without cheese.

There are currently 10 McDonald's restaurants in Israel.

The company's chief rival, Burger King, already operates three kosher outlets.

WORLD

Albania Honored

TIRANA, Albania — Israel paid tribute earlier this month to Albania, where not a single Jew fell into Nazi hands during 13 months of German occupation during World War II.

Four Albanian families who hid and saved Jewish families during the war received Israel's Righteous Among the Nations award at a moving ceremony here presided over by Miriam Ziv, an official at Israel's embassy in Rome.

Ziv said Albanians rescued roughly 300 Jews during the Nazi occupation.

Nazi's Trial Starts

BERLIN — The trial of a key leader of the neo-Nazi movement in Germany began here last week under heavy security.

Arnulf Priem, 47, is charged with 15 offences, including illegal possession of arms and ammunition and possession of illegal symbols.

Holocaust Museum Here?

MOSCOW — Russian Prime Minister Viktor Chernomyrdin told a high-level American Jewish delegation here last week that President Boris Yeltsin is committed to building a Holocaust museum in the Russian capital.

A different approach to burial is now available at HEBREW BASIC BURIAL, the only facility of its kind in Toronto for the exclusive use of the Jewish community. It responds to the needs of families who want a traditional graveside service arranged in a modest setting at our offices located at 3429 Bathurst Street.

We view Kavod to the deceased, a high standard of professionalism and community service as our prime responsibilities. Families will note the clearest differences between full-service chapels and HEBREW BASIC BURIAL in the limitations of our facilities and the role of our staff, and consequently in the savings. While this approach may not be for everyone, we welcome your inquiries by telephone or in person to help determine if HEBREW BASIC BURIAL will offer a comforting experience to you and your family.

CJC may seek new funding methods

Possible confrontation with federations seen

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The Canadian Jewish Congress Plenary Assembly set itself on a possible course of confrontation with the federation funding-structures last week by resolving to seek ways to raise its own funds in light of decreasing dollars coming from CJF Canada.

The plenary decided — with little opposition — that Congress would "investigate alternative and/or additional means of financial support for the organization, including, but not limited to, an internal fundraising mechanism, to enable the organization to properly carry out its mandate well into the 21st century."

While the controversial resolution said the new means of financial support should not conflict with local campaigns, it underscored rising discontent within Congress that decreased funding is beginning to turn it into a shell of its previous self.

"This is threatening the very existence of Congress," said former Quebec regional chair Manuel Shacter.

"Fundraising [for Congress] was ceded to the federations, but those funds were raised in trust," he said.

"They don't belong to the federation. They belong to each of us."

Shacter likened the situation to "making a horse do without oats. But then the horse dies."

Shacter's comments were echoed in a treasurer's report issued by Stanley Abbey.

The report shows that between 1992 and 1995, Congress' national funding dropped from $3.56 million to $3.19 million.

"This has put tremendous pressure on our staff and has been the cause of certain programs being eliminated or severely curtailed," Abbey said.

"If this trend is to continue for the coming budget year, your new administration and staff across the country will not be able to function at levels in keeping with the achievement level for which Congress is known," he said.

Former president Irving Abella termed the decline in funding a "dreadful situation" in terms of Congress' ability to carry on its advocacy work.

The plenary passed a total of 17 resolutions, rejected three, and tabled one under nine general headings at an early-morning session that got off to a late start due to a delay in mustering a quorum of 60.

Time constraints forced the plenary to put 10 other resolutions on hold until Congress' next national council meeting.

Among the resolutions carried by the assembly included those to have: the Canadian government recognize Jerusalem as Israel's capital; to "deal sternly with" Iran's ties to international terrorism; and to break off diplomatic relations with any country involved in international terrorism.

Bronfman says community must 're-examine priorities'

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — With anti-Semitism "almost dying out" in North America the Jewish community should allocate more of the funds it raises to Jewish education to counter the attraction of assimilation, World Jewish Congress (WJC) president Edgar Bronfman told the recent Canadian Jewish Congress Plenary Assembly.

He advised the community to "re-examine its priorities" in how it spends its money in order that every Jewish child, who wants one, receives a Jewish education and a trip to Israel during high school. "Our biggest enemy is apathy, not a lack of money," he said.

Surveys of young Jewish leaders have demonstrated that it is a Jewish education and time in Israel that hooked them on being active community members, he said.

In the United States, he suggested that a great deal of "overhead" could be saved if the Anti-Defamation League, American Jewish Committee and American Jewish Congress were merged.

He argued that North American Jews are living in "the best of times, the worst of times."

'Done too good a job'

The community, he said, has "done too good a job" of eliminating anti-Semitic discrimination in such areas as employment and admission to clubs.

The fact that a recent poll found that 70 per cent of white Americans would consider a Jew an acceptable marriage partner shows that most Americans are "not anti-Semitic at all," he said.

This comfort has lulled many Jews into complacency, he said.

Bronfman, who has been WJC president since 1980, described what he is proposing as a "renaissance of the Jewish spirit," based on a knowledge of Judaism. He said he himself is now studying the Torah.

"I believe people have the right to choose. The problem is many Jews don't know what it is they are abandoning. If they learn about Torah and Judaism and then decide it is not for them, then I have no problem."

Bronfman said he is troubled by the current catch-phrase Jewish continuity because it lacks a sense of getting back a sense of pride in Judaism, which he termed "a marvellous product to sell.

"I'm worried that if we keeping doing what we're doing, we won't have much of a Diaspora in a couple of generations."

Beilin wants teens in Israel

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Yossi Beilin, Israel's controversial deputy foreign minister, continued his push for the peace process and for a redefined relationship between Israel and the Diaspora at the Canadian Jewish Congress Plenary Assembly.

Beilin said Jewish organizations — including the Canadian and World Jewish congresses and federations — have meant well, but have been paying "lip service" to the Jewish continuity cause with talk and no action.

Beilin wants to raise $300 million a year on a plan he came up with two years ago to furnish "vouchers" to be exchanged by all Diaspora Jewish teens aged 17 and up for visits to Israel.

This would be part of an "education" process Beilin considers essential to lower the odds of assimilation and to commit young Jews to their heritage.

Beilin has come under a storm of criticism in the Diaspora and Israel for being quoted as saying that Israel no longer needs Diasporan support.

But Beilin said those comments referred only to Israel no longer needing Diaspora funds earmarked for its "welfare system."

Yossi Beilin

"I prefer that Israel pays for its own welfare system," he told the plenary, "instead of being paid for by world Jewry and not having young people go to Israel."

Beilin said Diaspora money should go towards local community concerns, absorbing Israeli immigrants and his "concrete" continuity "action plan" using the voucher-based trips, called Beit Israel.

Beilin said with the Jewish fight for equality won and Israel no longer under siege, Jews are no longer the beleaguered people who can use the threat of extinction to keep them together and identifying.

"If Herzl was born today, he never would have dreamt the Zionist dream. His fight was to be equal," Beilin said.

At an earlier and more heated session, Beilin staunchly defended the peace process despite a few catcalls and jeers, especially from two Jewish Defence League members.

Israel, he vowed, will not retreat to the "isolationism of a whole generation."

Israeli society has "normalized" and its economy and interntional ties are stronger than ever, he said.

"We are in a process of revolutionary change. The process is totally irreversible," Beilin said.

Beilin also angrily rejected charges that his party was prepared to sacrifice Jerusalem for a peace deal.

The issue will be "the most difficult part" of negotiations, he said, "but it is the most important common denominator all of us have."

Beilin, answering a question from an Egyptian reporter, also said that the ultimate hope for building the Palestinian economy lies "from within" and through launching joint projects with Israel.

"If we can't cooperate, no one else in the world will come out of the blue and save us," he said.

BBW honors Feld Carr

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Syrian Jewry activist Judy Feld Carr received the 1995 B'nai Brith Women (BBW) National Achievement Award at the organization's recent convention.

Feld Carr was recognized for more than two decades of work on behalf of Syria's Jews, about 2,000 of whom she personally helped rescue.

In presenting the award at the convention's closing luncheon, BBW Achievement Award chair Gloria Clamen called Feld Carr "one of the rare individuals for whom a call to conscience translated a commitment to our heritage into her own personal commitment.

"Who would have dreamed," Clamen asked "that the simple act of reading a story in the Israeli news of 12 young Jewish Syrian boys who were killed by land mines while trying to escape from Syria would precipitate a chain of events that 24 years later would result in the miracle of pidyon shvuyim, the ransom of the captives of Syria?

"In 1948, Jews in Syria numbered 15,000; in 1992, 4,000. Today there are fewer than 150. The rescue is all but finished."

In accepting a $1,000 donation in her honor to the BBW/Canada group home in Beit V'gan, Israel, as well as a watercolor by artist Maxine Blendis, Feld Carr said her rescue mission "exemplifies the aim of BBW — one person can make a difference."

"The Jews of Syria faded into oblivion. They were forgotten, but not in this community.

"By and large, our work has ended, and now there is a tinge of sorrow when we realize that it is the end of an era of our people in that country. This story must not be forgotten. We must remember that if women have the desire to contribute to the destiny of our people, it is within their hands and their hands alone."

Sessions at the convention included Women and Violence, Portrayal of Women in the Media, Breast Self-Examination, Anti-Semitism; and Israel: the Future.

CJN receptionist remembered

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jane Warren, CJN receptionist for the past two years, died suddenly last week (May 14). She was 58.

An emotional Gary Laforet, CJN general manager, described her as "a lovely, witty lady, who made the kind of contribution to our company that you just can't replace."

Warren had previously worked at the North York Mirror as assistant librarian. Laforet said that "her background in newspapers made her especially valuable in her work as receptionist here."

John Wilkinson, Mirror community editor, worked with her for nine years. "I used to stop by and get her jokes for the day," he said. "She always had a smile — she was well liked."

He said that professionally she was well organized and efficient. "If you needed something, she had it for you almost before you asked."

Daughter Andrea Goodison said Warren was "a wonderful Mom. She brought a ray of sunshine everywhere she went."

Besides her love of newspapers, she enjoyed doing crossword puzzles ("especially the really challenging ones"), baseball and her Toronto Blue Jays, and animals, having a large fox collection — pictures, figurines and stuffed toys.

She was very active in St. Timothy's Catholic Church, where she distributed communion, counted the collection and was involved in ShareLife Catholic charities and the Catholic Women's League.

Stunned CJN staff reminisced about her cheerfulness, her sense of humor and her interest in and concern for others.

Besides Goodison, Warren is survived by daughter Marianne Warren and sisters Barbara Purcell, Mary Sumner and Cathie Sabourin.

A funeral was held last Friday.

המספרים ממש מדהימים: מ- 1975 ועד היום עלה השכר הממוצע של שכיר ישראלי בצורה תלולה והוא כיום $1500 לחודש, טיפה יותר משכרו הממוצע של ... שכיר אמריקני. באותה תקופה, אחרי תיקון האינפלציה, גדל היצוא הישראלי פי 4, ואחוז הטכנאים והמהנדסים מכלל האוכלוסיה עלה מ-4 ל-16 אחוזים. לפי הערכה של גורמים שונים הכלכלה הישראלית סוגרת את עשור המדינות המובילות בעולם, וכל זה כמו להילחם עם יד אחת קשורה לגב, כשישראל מציאה עדיין אחוז גבוה מאוד מהתוצר הגלמי לצרכי ביטחון, כסף רב שאינו תורם הרבה לכלכלה.כמובן שהסיפור על השכר ששווה לשכרו של שכיר אמריקני הוא קצת נוקע מייעפס, כי כל ילד בן ארבע יודע שלא חשוב כמה כסף יש לבן אדם בכיס אלא מה אפשר לקנות איתו. באופן כללי-המחירים בארץ גבוהים פי שניים שלושה מהמחירים בצפון אמריקה והמס על 1500 הדולר בישראל גבוה בהרבה מזה של $1,500 באמריקה. ובכל זאת , הלב מתמלא גאוות, כי הכיוון של הדברים מאוד חיובי, וסך הכל עושים בישראל את הצעדים הנכונים. ואולי הפרט הכי מעודד : ברוב המדינות שוינקו מבתיה כלכלית גדל הפער בין העני לעשיר.בישראל, הפער לא גדל. לא שלעניים טוב, אבל כולם וזו קדימה במידה די דומה. כדאי לחשוב על המספרים הללו ברצינות רבה. עם יד על הלב - חלק לא קטן של הישראלים ששוהים בקנדה הגיעו הנה משיקולים כלכליים. לקבוצה זו של מהגרים- כדאי לחשוב היטב האם הסיכויים הכלכליים בישראל החדשה אינם שווים או אפילו טובים מאלה שבקנדה.

שקיעים קסמים

עיניים להם ולא יראו

THE Baycrest Campaigner

It's in the cards...the Baycrest Campaign, that is. The first 500 of approximately 4,000 Campaign pledge cards are in the hands of our hard working canvassers, with the rest rapidly on the way. Your generous response to a Baycrest canvasser will get the new Jewish Home for the Aged and its companion Centre for Cognitive Disorders quickly off the ground. There's certainly no debate about the need for a new JHA. Although the majority of existing JHA residents require wheelchairs, walkers or some other form of assistance, the rooms and corridors can't always accommodate assistive devices. Because of the current JHA's space shortage, privacy is at a premium and meals are largely restricted to a central first floor dining room - an inconvenience for those who find it difficult to get around. The new JHA will feature mostly single units with private bathrooms and dining areas on each floor. Today, over 70% of JHA residents, whose average age is 86, experience some kind of cognitive disorder. Caring for an increasing number of cognitively impaired older adults will be the new JHA's chief challenge. While the 372 bed JHA will concentrate on men and women with difficulties caused by diseases such as Alzheimer's, the 100 bed Centre for Cognitive Disorders will specialize in cognitive problems following events such as a stroke.

"The more I learn about Baycrest and its needs, the happier I am that I joined this Campaign."
Allan Offman, Campaign Co-Chair

The dean, professor and major lecturer of Baycrest University is Jonathan Miller.

Did you know that Baycrest has the largest kosher kitchen in North America, responsible for 3,400 meals a day...just one of the reasons why Baycrest occupies such a special place in the history of our city. Let's keep it that way, by supporting the Baycrest Campaign.

"The Baycrest...Imagine Our Future Without It Campaign will help us meet our mission to enrich the lives of the elderly. It is our responsibility and duty - as a community - to bring this mission to reality."

Sudbury community concerned about its future

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For about a century, the Jews of Sudbury have been able to maintain the critical mass and commitment necessary for community life and hope for the future.

Ranging in population from 100 families in its heyday in the 1940s and '50s to 22 families today, the community has built a synagogue, supported a B'nai Brith (BB) lodge and a Hadassah-WIZO chapter, and even provided for the education of its children.

But longtime community member Vivian Field is worried that the community's long and storied history is in danger — not from any external circumstance but from internal apathy.

"I'm concerned that Sudbury won't be a viable community in 15 years," she said on the telephone from her northern Ontario home. "Many young people don't have the commitment or connection to Judaism my father had. There's a lot of apathy.

"We have a lot of mixed religious couples; some participate, some are converts, some aren't. I think it's the numbers and the commitment that concerns me."

Field, who was born in Rouyn-Noranda and has lived in Sudbury for 35 years, believes the community has remained viable because of the commitment and activism of a core of "four or five people you can depend on."

Today, most of the current Jewish population is transient. Where once the community consisted of shopkeepers who passed their businesses to their children, today the Jewish community is made up of professionals who relocate when better job opportunities present themselves, Field said.

Nevertheless, the community does have a Jewish life, centred primarily on the synagogue, the Shaar Hashomayim. The congregation traces its roots back to 1919, though the present edifice was erected in 1960. Although the community no longer supports a rabbi (the last one left four or five years ago), a former city solicitor who lived in Sudbury for many years, Dennis Perlin, makes the trip from Toronto to daven during the High Holy Days, Field said.

There's also a weekly kabbalat Shabbat and services for all the major holidays.

In a small community like Sudbury, one place of worship has to accommodate all tastes and the shul is home for those of Reform, Reconstructionist and more traditional streams of Judaism, she said.

About 10 children participate in afternoon Hebrew school under the supervision of Judi Cartman, assisted by some parents. "It used to be a lot more but you don't have a group of parents for whom Judaism is that important," Field said. "And the kids have more secular events than they did 25 years ago."

Sudbury maintains links to the wider Jewish community through a variety of means. In addition to its participation in Hadassah-WIZO (the chapter was established in 1929) and a BB lodge, the community participates in the annual United Israel Appeal. It is also linked to other small Ontario communities through Canadian Jewish Congress.

Under the auspices of the Congress small communities committee, Sudbury young people get together with their counterparts from North Bay, Sault Ste. Marie, Timmins and even Geraldton (west of Sudbury) for weekend retreats and programs.

Last year, two Sudbury teens travelled to Israel as part of the Pincus program, she added.

That's the sort of outside assistance the first Jewish pioneers in Sudbury could hardly have dreamt of. Field's grandfather came to the town in the 1880s and like many other immigrants, made his living as a peddler, visiting all the mining communities in the area.

Many of the early community consisted of Jews from Middle Europe and Romania, Field said. Two generations later, their grandchildren were attending universities in larger centres. Many never came back.

Move forward together

Distracted by accusations of election foul play and by publicly-aired expressions of pique and of anger, the community may have missed the significance of the 24th Plenary Assembly of the Canadian Jewish Congress last week in Montreal.

Delegates met at a time when Congress is at a crossroads. Like every other community agency, it must adjust to diminished yields from federation fundraising campaigns and thus, to reduced national and regional budgets.

This adjustment may be painful however depending upon the extent to which funding is constrained. It will require assertive direction from president Goldie Hershon: a well-defined, articulated sense of Congress' mission, an unembellished understanding of the implications of further community fracture, and a clear eye to the changing shape of Canada's Jewish community.

But Hershon is a veteran: able, experienced and enthusiastic. It is imperative that Congress activists set aside any lingering election frustrations and disappointments to join in her enthusiasm and move forward together.

Speaker after plenary speaker attested to the number and to the complexity of the issues facing Canadian Jewry. Congress has an important role to play in stewarding the community through them. Whether that role must change to meet the changing times is the first order of business for the new administration.

To the leaders of Congress, we extend our best wishes. May God grant you the resolve and the wisdom to find the right answers.

Mark well her ramparts

Twenty eight years ago on the 28th day of Iyar, June 7, Jewish soldiers entered the walled City of Jerusalem through the Lions Gate. It was the beginning of the third day of what was to be called the Six Day War. The chief rabbi of Israel's defence forces was with the soldiers. A Torah scroll propped on his left shoulder bounced on his collarbone and brushed against his left cheek as he ran with them. They were pushed inexorably forward by a furious momentum that beat in their hearts and coursed through their veins like the relentless raging of a wild eastern wind sundering the Red Sea.

Jerusalem was reunited. It was the fulfilment of a dream for which the Jewish people had prayed for millennia.

Throughout the years, the very word Jerusalem has stirred memory, emotion, longing and awe. Our sages said that the city has 70 names. The name appears in the Bible 656 times; 83 different languages are spoken in its streets and in its homes by people from more than 100 different countries. At times a lament, at times a sigh, in the dark days of suffering even a whisper, Jerusalem has always been the centre of our hope. It was never merely a city. It was and is the pinpoint focus on which Jewish existence, memory, peoplehood and future converge.

Today, as ever, Jerusalem is much in the news. Quarrels and confrontation over subjects such as the expropriation of land, "final status," or the locations of embassies, constantly swirl around it. Though the city of peace, it is forever without rest.

The psalmist has advised us how to deal with these controversies. And it is advice we should recall and follow on this anniversary.

"Fair in situation, the joy of the whole earth; even Mount Zion, the uttermost parts of the north, the city of the great King. God in her palaces has made Himself known for a stronghold ... Walk about Zion, and go round about her; count her towers, mark well her ramparts, traverse her palaces, that you may tell it to the generations that will follow."

Ontario's leaders debated each other on TV.
They spoke much more politely than they do in the legislature.
A wise man hears one word but understands two.

MP's comments on war criminals abhorrent

A copy of the following letter to Walt Lastewka, Liberal MP for St. Catharines, Ont., was sent to The CJN.

I have seen words attributed to you of the inhumanity of the Canadian government in rendering decisions of denaturalizing Nazi-war criminals. It strikes me as a rather odd comment by an MP, especially with the various ceremonies throughout Europe this month thanking Canadian soldiers, living and dead, who freed Europe.

Your comment on picking on old frail men is abhorrent. When the man in question, if guilty, performed these atrocities, where was his humanity? Locked in the cellar basement for six years?

Your comments on the necessity of a trial is quite valid, and since both the Ukrainian and German governments wish to prosecute him, we should expedite his departure so those governments can enforce a speedy trial before this is swept under some Canadian bureaucratic carpet, never to surface again.

Your comments fly into the face of the thousands of Canadians who laid down their lives and the millions slaughtered by the Nazi regime.

I find your comments disgraceful, as an MP, and perhaps you should consider another vocation, as you have slapped the faces of hundreds of thousands of Canadians who were in combat, or relatives of deceased soldiers. You have also slapped the faces of your own leader, and the leaders of the Allied powers, as Europe was decimated through this bloody conflict.

General Wingate vets were there too

I wish to take exception to your article of the May 11 issue ("Political leaders take part in liberation ceremonies").

I am a member of the Canadian Legion No. 256 General Wingate Branch of Toronto. On Sunday, April 30, I and some comrades were part of an honor guard at the Yom Hashoah services, and marched to Convocation Hall at the University of Toronto with the Jewish War Veterans of Canada after the service.

No mention of us was made in your article, and I wish this to be corrected.

"No Jews or Dogs" signs in Laurentians

Newspaper reports in recent days telling of anti-Israeli signs of the 1930s and '40s saying "No Jews or Dogs Allowed" remind me of when I was seven years old in 1937 while in the Montreal Hebrew Orphans Home. We were sent to summer camp in St. Margret, Que. Our camp was located next to the Domain D'Estrel property.

When we went on hikes we saw signs on the property: "No Jews or Dogs Allowed." At that time the property was privately owned by Baron D'Estrel. We returned there for three years. In 1939 we heard the RCMP had raided the baron and found a radio transmitter, which he used to signal Nazi U-boats, and large quantities of guns and ammunitions hidden in the walls. Today Jewish groups have conventions at the Domain D'Estrel.

Disagrees with Rabbi Bulka on Poles

In his letter in the May 11 edition of The CJN, Rabbi Reuven Bulka of Ottawa presents a half-truth in his statement that " ... Poland ... the country so steeped in anti-Semitism that it eagerly cooperated with the Nazis in the cold-blooded murder of Jews."

Yes, Poland had a legacy of anti-Semitism, as did most of the nations of Europe. But no, Poland did not cooperate with the Nazis since there was no Poland either as an independent entity, or as a collaborator/ally of Germany. As for Poles, most were bystanders to the Holocaust, some profitted from it, and a relatively small number tried to rescue Jews. As Yisrael Gutman points out, Poles and Jews were unequal victims of the German occupation.

Regarding Rabbi Bulka's wish to bring the urn from Majdanek to Israel, Majdanek, according to The Encyclopedia of the Holocaust, was a killing ground for Jews as well as Soviet PoWs, Poles and other nationalities, unlike the other five extermination camps (Birkenau, Belzec, Treblinka, Sobibor, Chelmno), which were almost exclusively designated for Jews.

What is most disturbing about Rabbi Bulka's account is that he participated in the March of the Living, a trip for Jewish students to learn about the Holocaust. I would advise the organizers of this program to be more mindful in preparing both the chaperones and the students with respect to historical accuracy. The emotion of this experience must be balanced with facts.

Holocaust workshops are powerful

The North York Committee on Community, Race & Ethnic Relations has committed, for the past two years, to co-host two groups of young people from diverse community backgrounds at the Holocaust Memorial Centre. In memory of the 50th anniversary of liberation, our committee will broaden outreach and commit to bringing 300 individuals to the Holocaust Memorial Centre in 1995. We feel that this is one method of, not only remembering, but also sensitizing our communities in order to ensure that catastrophes like this do not continue.

I have found workshops with the survivors which I have attended to be so powerful that they left a real impact on everyone present. They not only leave those in attendance appalled by man's inhumanity to man they also inspire others by illustrating the courage of the survivors who have overcome even the most devastating obstacles.

Yom Yerushalayim: 28 years ago

By MICHAEL A. ZIMMERMAN

Jerusalemites are just like other Israelis ... only more so.

Occasionally it is worth applying discipline to think about a cliche. In reply to the question "What is the reason for the Israeli Army's success?" one often hears: "Ain breira" (There is no alternative). Israelis fight with their backs to the sea.

In the 1967 Six Day War, Jerusalemites fought only metres from their homes and families, just as they did in 1948.

Eight years after the Six Day War, a group sat over thick coffee and grilled fish, in an old stone house in the suburb Ein Karem. I asked Aaron, who fought as sergeant of a reconnaissance platoon in the Jerusalem Brigade, what it was like.

"A lot of the men had fought for Jerusalem in 1948 and knew the city, the parts that were cut off from us," Aaron said.

In 1948, the formation which became the Jerusalem Brigade was known as the Etzion Brigade, named for the bloc of settlements 10 miles south, which fought long and terribly alone to save Jerusalem. After many casualties, nearly out of ammunition, Etzion Bloc surrendered. The bloc was a group of renewed Jewish villages between Bethlehem and Hebron established in the 1930s. Immediately, 100 Jews were massacred. But Jerusalem was saved.

Unlike most Israeli military units, for most of the period from statehood to the 1967 war, the brigade had a particular region of activity — the home area of most of its solidiers.

"The beginning of the fedayeen attacks was here behind Ein Karem when three of our soldiers were killed near Sataf in 1951," Aaron said. "The terrorists had come from Nebi Samuel, north of Jerusalem. My infantry company then was commanded by the world famous professor of Bible from Hebrew University, Shmaryahu Talmon. We backed up a small group of eight men led by Arik Sharon, which made the first counter-raids."

That group was the core for the legendary 101 Commando unit, whose fighters and esprit de corps laid the groundwork for the parachute corps of the Israel Army.

In 1967, the Jerusalem Brigade was deployed defensively, facing Jordan's Arab Legionnaire troops on the divided frontier of Jerusalem.

On June 5, 1967, the Jerusalem Brigade suffered "from silence." Aaron recalled that the Israeli high command had decided there would be a news silence. "During all the broadcasts after the morning sirens, the radio spoke of fierce fights in the Negev — meaning we were retreating — and the humidity!" Aaron laughed. "Then they gave weather forecasts for the next day. This was the only source of our news.

"In the south, there was no danger, morale-wise, because there our boys knew the truth — we were on the offensive. But the poor Jerusalem Brigade waited three hours until Hussein attacked. Little Hussie. Then thousands of artillery shells were fired upon us. We were a single brigade against a good army — the Legion. We heard all the fantasies from the radios of the Arabs and our radio spoke of Negev fights and humidity! Everyone felt things were terrible. It was a black day."

All that long day, Aaron and a few others from his platoon defended a point and spotted for artillery counter-fire in the divided Jerusalem border suburb of Beit Safafa, south of town.

"I fell asleep near midnight and was awakened by someone kissing me," remembered Aaron. "It was my comrade Nissim. When they broke radio news silence, he was ecstatic with joy — 350 Arab planes smashed, finished! That's it. From that moment on, everything was okay."

During the Six Day War, the opportunity arose to liberate the Jordanian-occupied portion of Jerusalem. Following the early morning outbreak of fighting between Israeli and Egyptian forces in the south, King Hussein ignored an Israeli message (passed via the UN) that if Jordan did not intervene in the conflict, Israel would take no warlike steps against her.

Hussein opened artillery fire in the late morning and then sent his infantry to capture a dominating terrain feature in "no-man's land." This was Jebel Mukaber, across the valley south of the Old City, site of Government House of the former British Mandate, and since United Nations headquaters in Israel. This demilitarized high ground proved more a magnet for, than deterrent to war.

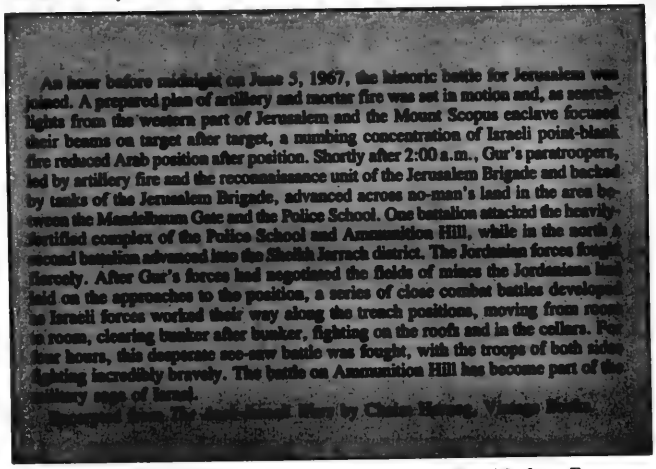
The sole Israeli formation initially facing the Jordanian military forces deployed in and around Jerusalem was the Jerusalem Brigade. During the ferocious, strangely short, miraculous battle for the city, the local unit was joined by a parachute brigade led by Jerusalem-born Motta Gur, later Chief of Staff of the Israel Defence Forces.



An hour before midnight on June 5, 1967, the historic battle for Jerusalem was joined. A prepared plan of artillery and mortar fire was set in motion and, as searchlights from the western part of Jerusalem and the Mount Scopus enclave focused their beams on target after target, a numbing concentration of Israeli point-blank fire reduced Arab position after position. Shortly after 2:00 a.m., Gur's paratroopers, led by artillery fire and the reconnaissance unit of the Jerusalem Brigade and backed by tanks of the Jerusalem Brigade, advanced across no-man's land in the area between the Mandelbaum Gate and the Police School. One battalion attacked the heavily-fortified complex of the Police School and Ammunition Hill, while in the north a second battalion advanced into the Sheikh Jarrach district. The Jordanian forces fought fiercely. After Gur's forces had negotiated the fields of mines the Jordanians had laid on the approaches to the position, a series of close combat battles developed. As Israeli forces worked their way along the trench positions, moving from room to room, clearing bunker after bunker, fighting on the roofs and in the cellars. For four hours, this desperate see-saw battle was fought, with the troops of both sides fighting incredibly bravely. The battle on Ammunition Hill has become part of the military saga of Israel.

Reprinted from The Arab-Israeli Wars by Chaim Herzog, Vintage Books.

The second day, Aaron's platoon was ordered to attack and clear the eastern slope of the hill where the British Government House sits. It was house-to-house fighting.

Aaron recalled that he drove his motor-scooter to the front line. On June 7, the men were given two hours to rest. He got a lift back to his scooter and rode home for dinner and then back.

"Two neighbors and I had captured the area of the Tomb of Rachel on the road to Bethlehem, but at first we didn't recognize it," he said. "Why? Because we remembered the famous pictures of the tomb with the fields and trees. The Arabs had built villas around there. When we finally realized it was the tomb, we burst out crying!"

Aaron added, "After a few minutes the mayor of Bethlehem came from the gas station across the road in a nice suit, to surrender. There were white flags, sheets and pillow cases hung on all the houses. The mayor said to me in English, 'Listen, I like Prime Minister Eshkol!'

" 'Maybe you like him,' I replied, " 'I dislike him!' The fellow was shocked."

The first unit into action at Government House was nicknamed the academic reserves. Aaron thought back. "This type of academic which made up so many of my unit — you know how they never trust their own ability as fighters. They are too sophisticated. But they fought wonderfully in 1967."

Prior to 1967, Jewish armies had captured Jerusalem three times. King David made it the capital of Israel. The Maccabees liberated Jerusalem and cleansed it after it was desecrated by the Greeks. Bar Kochba's liberation fighters wrested it from Roman legions. A fourth time, the Jews helped; in 1917, three battalions called Jewish Legions were among the British forces that drove the Turks from Eretz Israel.

The prophets had warned that for Jerusalem "danger comes from the north," and indeed Jerusalem's conquerors, from the Babylonians to the British, had approached from that direction. From three directions, the ground falls away steeply from the city walls; only in the north is there no valley. In 1967, however, the Jewish army liberated the Old City from another direction.

The Jerusalem Brigade took the southern approaches to the city. The parachutists attacked on foot through Mea Shearim to the hill just north east, near the present neighborhood of Ramat Eshkol, and captured what became known as Ammunition Hill, in a ferocious and difficult night action.

A reserve armored unit, using Sherman tanks from World War II, advanced from half-way to Tel Aviv towards Ramallah and closed in on Jerusalem's northern suburbs, screening them from Jordanian reinforcements to the north.

Then the parachute unit used indirect tactics. With commander Motta Gur in the lead, it broke into the Old City from the east, through Lion's Gate, under fire from Jordanians on the Old City walls and the heights across the valley to the east on Mount Olives. Some 200 Israeli soldiers and civilians died in the violent two-day battle for Jerusalem, June 5 and 6, 1967. Over 1,000 were wounded. On the Jordanian side, 350 soldiers and 100 civilians were lost.

"Maybe you feel more for what you fight," said Aaron, "when you defend your home."

Opinions

Germans react to VE-Day

The last few months have focused on the 50th anniversary of the liberation of the concentration camps and, more recently, on VE-Day.

I have repeatedly been asked how the Germans react to these observances. There is no one answer, but the following news items will convey part of the trend.

Holocaust revisionist Günther Deckert will be going to jail on charges of incitement, a court in Karlsruhe in south-western Germany ruled recently. The case has an interesting history.

A few years ago Deckert was responsible for a program of publicizing revisionist literature (denying the Holocaust). He was citing a self-styled "execution expert" who maintained that the genocidal practices attributed to the Nazis were technically impossible. Deckert, who is the head of the right-wing extremist National Democratic Party, was subsequently indicted on charges of revisionism, which is illegal in Germany.

At first he was sentenced to a year's probation, but while the conviction was upheld, the sentence was rejected by Germany's highest court for criminal matters and the case was sent back for reconsideration.

Last June, Deckert was again sentenced to probation on the grounds — according to the judge — that he displayed "strength of character" and a "sense of responsibility." The judgment evoked outcries across Germany and it too was rejected by the federal court.

Worst crimes against humanity

Now the judges have condemned Deckert to two years of imprisonment without the possibility of parole. According to The Week in Germany (from which this information comes), the sentence was widely applauded throughout the country. Last spring, the Federal Constitutional Court confirmed that denying of the Holocaust is not protected under the basic law which guarantees freedom of speech.

The second item I would mention is the public agitation of the president of the Central Committee of German-Jews, Ignatz Bubis, who spoke at the anniversary observance in Bergen-Belsen. He suggested the introduction in Germany of a memorial day to remember the victims of National Socialism, a suggestion widely publicized in Germany. It was a strange coincidence that two participants in the ceremonies were called Herzog: former Israeli president Chaim Herzog, and the current German president Roman Herzog (who is not a Jew).

It is worth quoting two paragraphs from Roman Herzog's address:

"It is not easy for me to speak at this place and on this day. To begin with, it is difficult to speak at this place. The name Bergen-Belsen represents, along with many other concentration camp names, the worst crimes against humanity which history has known. In addition to our mourning for the dead, come shame and outrage. Shame and outrage that it was Germans who committed these crimes and that this happened in the land of Lessing, Kani and Goethe.

"Secondly, it is hard to talk on this day altogether. Today is the day when Jews everywhere and especially in Israel remember the victims of Nazi crimes, the Yom Hashoah. When we Germans observe this day together with the victims, we know that we are part of these sins; nothing must be repressed, nothing must be forgotten. We have the responsibility to see to it that something like this will never occur again."

Five thousand people were present at the observance.

Once again - The big lie

Imagine the news story on the fire at Ernst Zundel's house written according to the Revisionist approach.

In fact, it would have to begin by asking,

"Did that fire actually take place? After all, what we saw on TV could have been the same type of on-stage fabrication as the landings on the moon and Mars, and we all know that man has never left the face of this planet. But in order to protect the sham of the space exploration project, we have created this incredible myth of space travel. Why, to ask us to believe this is to put us right up there with the actors on X-Files."

Once again we see the insidious myth-makers at work. Once again the media and those in high places are out to trick us. Once again we are asked to believe the unbelievable.

I refer of course to trumped-up accusations that a fire was set outside the home of truth-seeker Ernst Zundel in Toronto, in order to terrorize him into silence.

Of course we all know this is just another example of how lies become the truth.

Oh, sure, there could have been a fire — but how could it have been set deliberately on a street in a major metropolis, with people walking by? There was smoke — maybe — but how do we really know that it occurred as reported?

How big was the fire? What was it supposed to have been ignited by? Where are the witnesses to its effects? An accidental match dropped in leaves will start a fire — we are asked to believe that persons unknown, with malice aforethought, dared to set this fire.

And what was the house constructed of? How big was the fence in front? What were the steps made out of? What about the other houses in the neighborhood? How come they were not touched?

We can see how the myth is constructed

We can see how the myth is constructed, with devious care.

And what was the role of the police? The fire department? The media? Oh, we know they are all in the pockets of international conspirators against the truth.

Police for instance — are they to be trusted when they were the very ones who hauled our leader to and from court? Clearly not.

The fire department? Just another tool of the governments that are out to convince us that an innocent fire was actualy a malicious act — if there was a fire at all.

And the media, out to senationalize, distort, even falsify evidence so that they will have a news story to sell. We all know they are controlled by interests that daily distort truth and make it bend to their secret radical liberal agenda.

So — a fire? No proof. Witnesses — out for their own aggrandizement. Media — always the tool, always looking for sensation.

What are we to believe?

Myth and countermyth

At a time when Muslim fundamentalism appears to be a high point, it is interesting to rethink the conventional opinions about the position of Jews in the Islamic world.

Since the 1930s, spokespeople for various Arab-Muslim factions have deplored the deterioration which has set in between Arabs and Jews. They argued that Jews had always been well treated in Islamic society and that "the Zionist enterprise" had violated that entente.

Jamil Baroudi, a Saudi diplomat at the United Nations in the 1970s, often pursued that line of argument in his speeches there. He and his colleagues would point, moreover, to the writings of a 19th-century Jewish scholar of Islam, Ignac Goldziher, to support their claims about the historical tolerance of Islam towards Jews.

In order to counter what some termed the myth of Islamic tolerance towards Jews, many Israeli and Jewish researchers conducted inventories of the situation of Jews as dhimmis (protected people under Islamic rule). One French-Jewish writer even claimed that while Islam never produced a catastrophe of the magnitude of the Holocaust, the total number of Jews victimized by Muslim violence over the centuries was similar to the number of Jewish victims of Christian anti-Semitism.

Most of the scholarly opinion on this question suggested that the truth lay somewhere between the two extremes: Jews never enjoyed the peaceful coexistence with Islam that has been the staple of Arab propaganda, but Jews generally fared better under Islam (despite sporadic outbursts of anti-Jewish violence) than under Christendom.

Now Mark R. Cohen, a professor of Near Eastern Studies at Princeton University, has pushed the pendulum back, examining the historical record from the rise of Islam to the beginning of the crusades.

Islam had a far more benign attitude than Christianity

In a recent study, called Under Crescent & Cross (Princeton), Cohen shows persuasively that Islam had a far more benign attitude towards Jews than Christianity did. The reasons are simple. First, Islam has no deicide myth in connection with the rise of the faith. Second, Islam did not emerge in competition with Judaism. Third, the religion begun by the Prophet did not have to struggle against the might of a colossus like the Roman empire. Fourth, Islam never had to portray itself as the "New Israel" with all the baggage implied in that term.

Theologically speaking Islam was also less confrontational towards Judaism than was Christianity. In fact, Muslim scholars used the venerable Arabic term shari'a (the body of sacred Islamic law) to describe Jewish law and Saadia Gaon, the great rabbinic scholar, unselfconsciously used the same word to translate the word Torah in his translation of the Hebrew Bible into Arabic. He even used the term, Koran, to render the word Bible into Arabic.

One of the most powerful influences that fuelled Christian anti-Semitism, the tradition of iconography — paintings, engravings, woodcarving and sculptures — was totally absent in Islam, which categorically forbade the depiction of human form in art. Medieval images of Jews involved in the infamous blood libel were inconceivable in classical Islam.

Cohen's treatment of the Pact of Omar — a document originating in the seventh century which defined the legal position of dhimmis — shows that despite the many incivilities visited upon Jews under the terms of this document, its overall effect was to guarantee recognition, protection and security to Jews under Islam.

Arthur Hertzberg once said it is not important whether Jews fared better under Islam or Christendom; what is important is that there be an airport in Lod to which Jews can repair when they need to. That may be so, but the issue of the fate of Jews under Islam is not a trivial one. For at least five centuries, until the bitter confrontations between Christians and Muslims in the crusades, Jews enjoyed relative tranquillity under the crescent as "protected" citizens. They did not, by and large, enjoy the same thing under Christendom.

Perhaps some day, the congenial spirit if not the structure of the previous Muslim-Jewish amity, can be restored.

Shimon Peres looks back

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Shimon Peres, Israel's foreign minister, can look back at a life of achievement. A protege of David Ben-Gurion, Israel's first and perhaps greatest prime minister, Peres has been inextricably involved in the country's development.

From procuring arms for the fledgling state in 1948 to building the atomic reactor in Dimona a decade later, Peres has been a formidable force in Israeli politics.

And since the Oslo peace process, of which he was arguably the chief architect, he has raised his profile still higher.

Two years ago, Peres outlined his utopian vision of peace in a book entitled The New Middle East. Now he has written his memoirs, Battling for Peace (Random House, $25 US), a thoughtful, anecdotal volume which brings him full circle.

Battling for Peace tends to be thorough. But there are glaring omissions — Peres' role in the establishment of settlements in the territories in the early 1970s, the Jonathan Pollard affair, and the events surrounding the arrest of Mordechai Vanunu, who leaked Israel's nuclear secrets to the press.

Peres was born in Vishneva — a shtetl in White Russia — in August 1923, the son of a prosperous merchant. He was raised in a traditional Jewish home and nurtured on Zionism and the Hebrew language. (His teacher, Yehoshua Rabinowitz, went on to become mayor of Tel Aviv and finance minister in the government in which Peres was defence minister.)

Though his parents' home was spacious and comfortable, the house had no running water or electricity, a revealing commentary on Vishneva's impoverishment.

In 1932, Peres' father set out for Tel Aviv, sending for his family shortly afterward. Peres thrived in Palestine. He joined a Zionist youth group and met his wife-to-be. Soon, he reached the upper echelons of the Labor Zionist movement. At around the same time, he Hebraicized his surname (Persky). It's a period of his adolescence he describes nostalgically.

Having displayed leadership qualities, Peres quickly advanced through the ranks. In 1947, on the eve of the War of Independence, Ben-Gurion and Levi Eshkol, a future prime minister, put in him charge of the Haganah's weapons procurement department. He worked hard and cultivated friendships, qualities which were to prove useful later on.

Peres writes of his efforts to buy military equipment from Czechoslovakia, some of which was tragically faulty. In addition, he recalls a bizarre incident in which Israel bought a World War II-vintage Canadian aircraft carrier. It was a dubious purchase, since Israel had no planes capable of landing or taking off on an aircraft carrier. On the voyage to Israel, the ship sank at sea, and Israel collected the insurance money.

By the early 1950s, Peres was deputy director general of the Ministry of Defence. Peres persuaded Ben-Gurion to appoint Pinhas Lavon as defence minister. Peres admired Lavon's analytical powers and his rhetorical skills, and believed that he and Moshe Dayan — the chief of staff — would function smoothly as a team.

In Peres' estimation, Lavon turned out to be a Frankenstein — "one of the greatest mistakes in the history of Israel." Lavon, he claims, made a series of "disastrous" decisions. And furthermore, he almost succeeded in having Peres ejected from the Mapai (Labor) party. "For me, these were some of the hardest moments of my life."

Yet more hardship lay in the offing. In 1965, he and Ben-Gurion seceded from Mapai, forming the vanguard of Rafi, a new, right-of-centre political party which ultimately capsized. Rafi was financially squeezed, and Peres remembers having to mortgage his refrigerator at home to help cover its debts. Eventually, Peres returned to Mapai.

Peres played an integral role in Israel's nuclear power program. But, as he reminds a reader, there was vehement opposition from scientists, who believed that Israel lacked the ability to build its own nuclear option and from cabinet ministers who recoiled at the cost.

But Peres, encouraged by Ben-Gurion, moved forward, recruiting unjaded scientists and enlisting the technical support of France. Peres also coined a phrase which has passed into Israel's political lexicon. In 1963, John Kennedy, the then U.S. president, asked Peres point-blank whether Israel was building "a nuclear option." Peres' disingenuous reply was: "We will not be the first ones to introduce nuclear weapons into the Middle East."

Further on, Peres writes at length about Israel's alliance with France (which he championed and forged); recalls the secret talks with France and Britain which led to the 1956 Sinai Campaign; and recollects the tense days before the 1967 Six Day War.

Peres takes credit for building the Good Fence in 1976. It enabled Israel to establish a sphere of influence in southern Lebanon. And he explains why he opposed the 1981 bombing of Iraq's nuclear reactor.

Interestingly enough, Peres believes his "finest hour" occurred in 1977, when he succeeded Yitzhak Rabin as leader of the Labor party and took on the burden of rebuilding that demoralized party. He denies he ever harbored animosity toward Rabin, his perennial rival, but his denial doesn't ring true.

In an analysis of Israel's 1982 invasion of Lebanon, Peres claims that the then prime minister, Menachem Begin, effectively lost control of the war to the generals. He singles out Ariel Sharon as one of the plotters.

Turning to another topic, Peres believes that the two national unity governments of the 1980s, in which he served as prime minister for two years, accomplished some good. The Israeli army more or less withdrew from southern Lebanon; inflation was tamed; and the Taba dispute with Egypt was submitted to international arbitration.

However, he observes, "I would not recommend a unity government as anything other than a last resort." Peres suggests that there was endless bickering and policy paralysis.

The Labor party's marriage of convenience with Likud ended abruptly in 1990, when Labor, with the assistance of Shas, brought down the government of Yitzhak Shamir in a vote of no-confidence.

The president, Chaim Herzog, asked Peres to cobble together a government. At the last moment, two Agudath Yisrael members of parliament — whose support he had counted on — backed off, and Shamir snatched victory from the jaws of defeat. Peres acknowleges that the outcome was "one of the most awkward, embarrassing and heartbreaking situations of my political career."

Similarly, Peres expresses bitterness over the loss of the Labor party's leadership to Rabin in 1992. "I felt I had earned my party's trust and had been unfairly removed... just when global and regional developments had brought peace into prospect."

Nevertheless, Peres rose to the occasion, putting aside bruised feelings and promising to cooperate with Rabin. On this basis, Peres explains, he and Rabin were able to proceed toward the still unrealized goal of peace in the Middle East.

Peres claims he fathered the Gaza First concept, which, in retrospect, gave birth to the Oslo peace process. "Our rule over Gaza," he notes, "was an ongoing, ghastly mistake."

In passing, Peres says he convinced Rabin of the necessity to deal directly, albeit clandestinely, with the PLO. Peres' narrative of Israel's hush-hush negotiations with its former adversary is instructive.

As he readily admits, he is an incurable optimist. Indeed, Peres' hopes for the Middle East are conditioned by this outlook.

Israel and the Arab states, he writes, are ending an era dominated by war and embarking on an epoch in which "the guns will stay silent."

He adds: "Peace in our region is no longer part of a dream world; it has built a permanent place for itself in the realm of reality."

Palestinian terrorist attacks have soured, even endangered, peace talks since the publication of Battling for Peace. But one suspects that these gruesome events have not fundamentally discouraged Peres, whose pragmatic conception of a new, peaceful Middle East is grounded in mutual self-interest.

Jewish World

By Sheldon Kirshner

Heartland U.S.

Commentators and columnists shouldn't have been surprised that the Oklahoma City terrorist bombing was conceived and carried out in America's "heartland."

If they had bothered doing their homework, they would have discovered that the two suspects charged so far with the crime were closely associated with the so-called patriot movement, which is strongly entrenched in the Midwest and the Pacific Northwest.

Far to the right of the mainstream, the movement is a hodgepodge of paramilitary militias, tax protesters, constitutionalists and, lest we forget, white supremacists-cum-neo-Nazis.

The movement appears to have no cohesive leadership or command centre, but all its components subscribe to apocalyptic conspiracy theories and the politics of paranoia, a combustible mixture which inevitably draws on racism and anti-Semitism, overt or covert.

Deeply resentful of central authority, principally the federal government, the movement is particularly disdainful of the United Nations and the Federal Reserve Board. The UN is regarded as a harbinger of a Socialist "one-world government" which would undermine and destroy the United States. The Federal Reserve Board is viewed as a tool of "international bankers" (a euphemism for Jews).

Adamantly opposed to gun control, these right-wing radicals, especially the white supremacists in their ranks, are not averse to violence.

In the past 15 years, they have targeted government buildings, killed federal marshals, robbed banks, tried to blow up synagogues and Jewish institutions, and murdered a Jewish radio talk show host (Alan Berg).

The most extreme elements, acolytes of the Aryan Nations and Christian Identity movements, hold that the United States is enslaved by the "Zionist Occupation Government" (ZOG), and that Jews are the children of Satan and must be exterminated.

These extremists, spiritual descendants of rabid anti-Semites like Gerald L.K. Smith and Father Charles Coughlin, whose popularity peaked in the 1930s and 1940s, look to William Pierce for guidance and inspiration.

Pierce, who heads an outfit called the National Alliance, based in West Virginia, is best known for an anti-Semitic political novel, The Turner Diaries, published in 1978. Widely considered the bible of the radical right, it describes a revolt in which whites rebel against the government, killing Jews, blacks and "race criminals," notably liberal politicians and white women who've cohabitated with African-Americans.

One may scoff at these malevolent extremists who would wreak havoc and death in the name of freedom and liberty. They are, after all, on the fringe of American society. But they are armed and dangerous, and if the federal government does not crack down on these lunatics with unflagging resolve, the streets of America will run red with the blood of innocent victims.

Being involved in Jewish life today, one cannot avoid the phrase Jewish continuity. It is ubiquitous at this time, as the focus of commissions, studies and funding initiatives.

Yet, a colleague of mine, Rabbi Jerome Epstein comments: "It is my strong feeling that the Jewish continuity endeavor has in fact deflected us from our real task ... our challenge must be to fashion a vibrant and dynamic Judaism for the present, that will extend to the future."

Following up on this statement, Rabbi Epstein proceeds to enumerate three major problems with the current continuity strategy.

First, the stance of proposing efforts for the next generation, rather than toward the present generation ignores the responsibility to help each Jew grow in his or her partnership with G-d. Why should the benefits of Judaism be entrusted to others and not to ourselves? If Judaism does not affect the way we approach life, it becomes trivial.

Second, consider the negativity about Judaism contained in this exclusive focus on the future. What is the message we give to our children when we tell them, "You have to go to synagogue services ... You have to learn Hebrew." The message is clear. Judaism is just for kids.

Third is the paradox of the continuity effort. We want our children to undergo rich Jewish experiences that will impact upon their lives. But what happens after camp or the trip to Israel? If our Jewish lives lack vibrancy, the emotions we have touched in our young people will dissipate without a place to sustain and nurture them.

Rabbi Epstein points to what is our true challenge. He observes: "We must embark on a new campaign that will focus on Jewish living now. By creating a community that lives Jewishly, we develop our best chance to ensure the continuation of our rich heritage."

It would appear that a focal point of such an effort is the synagogue. The synagogue is the institution most significant in any campaign to promote the personal and familial undertaking of mitzvot and a Jewish lifestyle. It is the arena where the struggle with the question "Why be Jewish?" will take place.

Our communities cannot live rich Jewish lives without strong, vibrant synagogues that promote Jewish observance, Jewish learning, and perhaps most important, Jewish searching. We cannot ignore the social and recreational aspects of synagogue life. But the question that is begged is this — if the synagogue is merely a place for gathering, a place of Jewish style without Jewish substance, how will it be able to meet the challenges of the present day?

If shul is relegated to life cycles events, High Holy Days, and an occasional class in current events, from whence will emerge the leadership that will ensure a vital Jewish tomorrow?

Renewing allegiance to Judaism

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

The book of Ruth describes the relationship between two women, Ruth and Naomi. Ruth is the first person in the Tanach to choose Judaism and upon whom Jewish law bases the structure of formal conversion.

In the opening chapter we meet the core family: Elimelech, his wife Naomi and their two sons, but the picture changes drastically by the fifth verse. Ten years elapse, the sons marry Moabite women and succumb to fatal illnesses. The main characters, the three men, die and the mother remains alone.

Naomi convinces one daughter-in-law to return to her family while the other, Ruth, chooses to remain with Naomi and return to Israel. Ruth utters the famous pledge: "Whither thou goest I will go." The rabbis have interpreted her story as outlining the legal conversion process.

Yet the reader is shocked by the sudden absence of the male characters. A span of 10 years is dismissed in five verses, these 10 years could surely be expanded into chapters of information.

Clearly, the focus shifts away from the men and onto Naomi and Ruth. The word chosen for Ruth's allegiance to Naomi is the same word used in Genesis for describing the union of man and woman, "cleave onto."

In Genesis the verse states that the man will "cleave onto his woman and they will be of one flesh." Naomi likewise refers to Ruth as "my daughter," although their relationship technically ends with the death of Ruth's husband, and there is no longer a legal tie between them. Is there a connection between the focus, the choice of wording and the model for conversion?

There are two ways in which a person is considered a Jew. They are born into the religion, or they formally accept the religion. The Bible instructs us that we must accept converted Jews equally to those born as Jews, but the demand for equality in status is a difficult one and seems artificially imposed.

Yet, the rabbinic understanding of Ruth makes the identical claim. Naomi refers to Ruth as her daughter, Ruth is described as "cleaving" to Naomi. Coupled with the verse from Genesis, the image of becoming one flesh arises. When speaking of man and woman, becoming "one flesh" refers to a physical act of intimacy.

However, when speaking of two women, the word evokes a much different image. The woman embodies union with another while she is pregnant. A born Jew is "of one flesh" while connected to its mother. Whether Ruth was born a Jew, or she accepted the religion, she is referred to by the text in the same way.

As Shavuot approaches all Jews celebrate their acceptance of the Torah. Those of us born as Jews (Naomi), and those of us who choose Judaism (Ruth) are equally renewing our allegiance to this document. The book of Ruth deliberately focuses on women, for through women can the image of birth be strongly equated with the statement of choice.

Chrétien to help launch new Yad Vashem centre

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It's a one-two punch for the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem: not only will Prime Minister Jean Chrétien address the society's May 31 dinner at the Regal Constellation Hotel in suburban Toronto, but the organization will also announce the establishment of the Canadian Chair for Holocaust Studies and the Dan Family Multi-Media Centre.

Both will be located in the Canada Pavilion of the planned Central School of Holocaust Studies at Yad Vashem in Jerusalem.

The multi-media centre, which will house computers, films, archives and audio recordings, is named for Toronto philanthropist Leslie Dan, chair and CEO of Novopharm Ltd. and a Holocaust survivor.

It's all part of a $10 million refurbishment at Yad Vashem, the world's foremost repository for Holocaust archives and studies. Plans also call for an expansion of the Avenue of the Righteous and the updating of the central museum.

When complete, the Central School of Holocaust Studies will overlook Jerusalem's Judean hills. Groundbreaking is expected to take place in September 1996.

The Canadian Chair for Holocaust Studies will be awarded to a deserving scholar and the Canada Pavilion will also house a complete educational centre, says Canadian Society for Yad Vashem chair Joel Dimitry.

Dimitry is most excited, however, by the multi-media centre. Using the latest technologies, it will allow visitors and scholars to use computers to retrieve documents, photographs, film footage and even audio recordings of the Holocaust era. Already, data are being stored on CD-ROM discs. Eventually, he says, millions of Yad Vashem archives will be accessible worldwide through the Internet.

Chrétien is expected to pay tribute to the Holocaust's 6 million Jewish victims and to mark the 50th anniversary of the end of World War II. At least two cabinet ministers — Treasury Board president Art Eggleton and Solicitor General Herb Grey — are slated to attend the dinner, as is Yad Vashem chair Avner Shalev and Israel's ambassador to Canada, Itzhak Shelev.

For ticket information, call 905-660-6028.

Beth Jacob honors two families

TORONTO — This year's Beth Jacob High School and Jacob Perlman Seminary annual dinner will honor the Korolnek and Rubenstein families.

The dinner will be held May 31, at 7 p.m. at Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto synagogue.

Itshe Meyer Korolnek, the family patriarch, was a colorful character in the history of Jewish Toronto. He was a founder of Eitz Chaim Schools and Torath Emeth Congregation, and was known for helping immigrants find a livelihood where they would not have to desecrate Jewish law.

A successful businessman (he founded Consolidated Bottle Co.), he was involved with many charitable and educational ventures, a tradition followed by his children, Harry and Max, and by their children.

Hershel Rubenstein, head of the Rubenstein family, also supported religious education in Toronto, especially Rabbi Abraham Price's Yeshivat Toras Chaim. He helped found Eitz Chaim Schools, Yeshivat Maharil Graubart and Toronto Agudah.

Rubenstein also helped organize the first free-standing mikvah in the city.

Other philanthropies he helped included the Telse Yeshiva, Ner Israel and Kollel Esh Dat.

The dinner will also mark the school's 35th anniversary; the 60th yahrzeit of Sarah Schenirir, who established the first Bais Yaakov schools, the first formal Orthodox school system for girls; and the 16 members of the school's first graduating class.

Guest speaker will be Rabbi Yaakov Feitman, rabbi of Young Israel of Beachwood in Cleveland.

Women meet in Winnipeg

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Mideast branch spring conference of Women's League for Conservative Judaism was held in Winnipeg this year for the first time since 1989.

Denny Hornstein, the local conference chair, said the annual conference held at the International Inn attracted 90 delegates from Winnipeg, Saskatoon and nine midwestern American cities — representing 16 sisterhoods. Another 60 local women attended some of the programs.

The conference, whose theme was Walk in the Path of Understanding, was hosted by the sisterhoods of the city's three Conservative synagogues and all the Conservative rabbis participated.

Rabbi Akiba Lubow of Winnipeg's Rosh Pina Congregation discussed the Jewish perspective of bioethics; Rabbi Alan Green of the Beth Israel Synagogue spoke on the search for spirituality; Rabbi Henry Balser of the Congregation Shaarey Zedek led an analysis of the lessons of the Holocaust; and Rabbi Neal and Carol Rose analyzed the prospects of Jewish continuity.

In the keynote address, Cory Schneider, national consultant for the Women's League, spoke on Understanding the Path.

Affiliated with the Jewish Theological Seminary, the Women's League for Conservative Judaism, founded in 1918, is the world's largest women's synagogue organization with over 150,000 members in Canada, the United States and Israel.

Next year's Midwest branch conference is scheduled for St. Paul, Minn.

Ottawa delegation to meet with candidates

MIRIAM SOBEL
CJN Correspondent

OTTAWA — A joint delegation representing Ottawa's Jewish community and B'nai Brith will be making the rounds of candidates' offices in the next few weeks to inform incumbents and hopefuls about the concerns of the Jewish community.

First on the list is the future of Hillel Lodge, Ottawa's Jewish home for the elderly. The Jewish Community Council recently approved a plan to rebuild the aging home on a central campus close to other institutions. The community intends to raise half the money but will be looking to candidates for support on receiving matching funds from government.

The delegation also wants to see if candidates support lifting a moratorium on long-term bed licences in the province. Hillel Lodge is facing a growing demand for care, but under current legislation can only add spaces if it buys licences from facilities that are cutting beds. The community would like to be able to add beds without having to find and buy licences.

Candidates will also be brought up to date on the Jewish community's concern about hate activity in Ontario.

Rubin Friedman, B'nai Brith director of government relations, says the delegation will focus on the benefits of anti-hate crime activities, such as race relations training for police and others in the justice system, multicultural education and bias crimes police units.

Friedman says he will also raise concerns about Ernst Zundel and his freedom to publish hate literature in Ontario.

School funding

Finally, the delegation will talk to candidates about the community's views on public funding for day schools.

Mitchell Bellman, director of community relations, says the meetings are designed to inform Jewish candidates about Jewish community issues, not to extract promises from them.

The Ottawa ridings with significant Jewish residents are all held by Liberals. In Nepean, incumbent Hans Daigler is running for his third term against NDP candidate John Sullivan and PC John Baird. In Ottawa West, the home of Hillel Academy, incumbent Bob Chiarelli is running against NDP Coreen Ismaili and PC Greg Joy, director of Ottawa's Food Bank.

Bernard Grandmaitre, the incumbent in Ottawa East where the Jewish Community Centre is located, is running against PC Cynthia Bled, a longtime member of the Ottawa Board of Education and NDP David Dyment.

In Ottawa South, Liberal Dalton McGuinty is running against former Olympic shooting champion, Conservative Linda Thom, and NDP candidate Margaret Armstrong.

The only candidate in Ottawa in the NDP government is Evelyn Gigantes, who will battle for Ottawa Centre with Liberal Richard Patton, who formerly held the seat, and PC Chris Thompson.

Just outside Ottawa, the forced resignation of Mohamed Bassuny in Carleton riding for publishing a book To Pope With Love that was offensive to Catholics, gays, women and the Pope, added some color to an otherwise lacklustre campaign [CJN, May 18].

Ethnic diversity in Markham

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

MARKHAM — The backgrounds of the candidates in the provincial riding of Markham reflect the region's ethnic diversity.

The riding includes a large chunk of Thornhill's Jewish community, the Chinese population around the Highway 7 corridor, a sizeable number of South Asians and people from the Middle East, and residents of the older areas of Markham and Unionville.

Liberal candidate Khalid Usman, 45, an accountant, is originally from Pakistan; NDP hopeful Mike Tang, 56, a wholesaler and distributor, is an immigrant from Taiwan; and Conservative Dave Tsubouchi, 44, is a third generation Japanese-Canadian.

All agree that while cutbacks are necessary, any government must maintain health care, education and services to seniors and people with disabilities. The Conservatives include law enforcement on that list.

Tang believes his experience in business and trade will be an asset to an NDP government.

If elected, he says he will help the many hi-tech businesses in Markham work together. He would also encourage the creation of a small and medium industry ministry to help find new markets and teach businesses how to access them.

Only exports can create jobs and wealth, he says.

He says he agrees with the NDP policy on waste control, pointing out that "garbage has to go somewhere. The government consulted with a well-respected group of people, produced an authoritative report, and offered a solution."

He warned that if the Interim Waste Authority (IWA) is scrapped, there is the danger of having a dump in Markham.

Usman says his party's platform is "precise, with time lines, commitments and the cost of everything. It is practical, affordable" and feasible.

He says voters are concerned about the deficit and jobs, with students worried about skyrocketing tuition fees and poor employment opportunities. Seniors, he says, are concerned about health care and pensions. All those issues, he says, are addressed in the Liberal red book of policies.

The Liberal party, he says, considers small business vital, responsible for creating 80 per cent of employment.

He advocates scrapping the IWA and JobsOntario, and cutting political staff and some services to MPPs.

Tsubouchi is the only candidate with political experience, having been a councillor for Markham's Ward 5 from 1988 to 1994.

For voters, taxes are the main issue, he has found.

"Their back is against the wall. They can't afford to pay more taxes," he says.

The deficit and job creation are other main concerns.

He believes the unemployed want meaningful work in areas they are trained for, "not just make-work jobs."

Sorbara's retirement leaves York Centre open

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

VAUGHAN — Al Palladini is well known in the Toronto area for his eponymous Woodbridge car dealership, but recently his name has been seen on Conservative party provincial election campaign posters in Vaughan and Richmond Hill.

Palladini, 51, decided to enter politics "because of the opportunities given to me by this province."

He is joined in the race by two other first-time provincial candidates, Liberal Mario Ferri (a former separate school board trustee), and Joseph Thevarkunnel for the Conservatives.

Mario Ferri

Al Palladini

Joseph Thevarkunnel

Gregory Sorbara, who has held the riding for the Liberals since 1985, is not seeking re-election.

The riding, which has a sizable Jewish population concentrated in Thornhill and to a lesser extent, in Richmond Hill, has over 100,000 voters, a larger number than any other riding in Ontario.

Palladini accuses the current NDP government of financial "mismanagement" because of its huge deficit. Both in York Centre and province-wide, the biggest issue is job creation, he told The CJN.

"Our last two governments have done a great job of driving business and industry away," he added.

Palladini is in favor of a proposed free trade agreement between Israel and Canada. "It could definitely create jobs for Ontario."

Other issues which concern him include tax reduction. He maintains that the Conservative party's proposed 30 per cent tax cut is realistic and he encourages voters to take an hour to read the party's "Common Sense Revolution."

York Centre is home to Keele Valley, Canada's largest dump site, and the Tories are exploring alternative solutions for waste management, Palladini said.

Jobs and growth are the major issues in this election, says Liberal candidate Ferri, 47, executive director of a Scarborough community centre.

He bases that on seven community forums which he's hosted since opening his campaign office in January.

Education is another priority for him, particularly with respect to duplication of services.

Ferri said he's made it clear that funding for independent schools is "a major concern" in York Centre. The Liberal party has agreed to a task force that will study the issue, he said.

Joseph Thevarkunnel, a 59-year-old teacher, has lived in Richmond Hill for 13 years. He emigrated from India 24 years ago.

As an NDP candidate, he would strive to eliminate racism and violence and work towards a society that is "growing and competitive on the international market."

He lauded Ontario Premier Bob Rae's "courage and decision-making power. The problems [he faced] were more than what everybody thought."

Thevarkunnel's wife, a hospital nurse, lost $5,000 in income when she was forced to take "Rae Days" off work. "But I am happy," the candidate said, "because a number of junior [nurses] are still working because of Rae Days."

Economy tops list in York Mills

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Economic concerns top the list of issues for the provincial election candidates in Metro's York Mills riding.

Incumbent Conservative MPP David Turnbull, 53, who has represented the mostly affluent suburban riding for the past five years, is being challenged by Liberal David MacNaughton and NDP hopeful Lesley Durham, both seeking office for the first time.

Turnbull, a native of Newcastle, England, has a business background. He has lived in York Mills for 20 years.

The riding houses two synagogues, the Orthodox Kehillat Shaarei Torah and Temple Emanu-El.

In a CJN interview, Turnbull stressed that the Tories' plan would mean no cutbacks in health care, law enforcement or classroom education. He also noted that the party plans to eliminate the employer health tax to encourage small business to create new jobs.

Turnbull thinks a proposed free trade agreement between Canada and Israel would be "absolutely magnificent. Israel is a logical partner, because they've got good technology and products we can use, and we've got products they can use."

The issue of funding for Jewish schools, currently before the courts, is not one on which the Conservative party has taken a position, said Turnbull. He believes there should be "some recognition" of the parents' financial burden.

Hate-related activity, while minimal in York Mills, is an issue about which he feels strongly. He is "particularly offended" by Holocaust denier Ernst Zundel.

MacNaughton, 46, a longtime Liberal who has served the party as an advisor, is a former public relations and communications company executive. He believes party leader Lyn McLeod has "the right combination of toughness, brains and compassion."

He agrees with Turnbull that Ontario's deficit must be brought under control, but he disputes the Conservative party's proposal for 30 per cent tax cuts, alleging they "would simply mean cuts in services down the road."

He believes the government should focus on controlling spending, and said it would take "a good four years" to avoid hurting the economy and taking away jobs.

MacNaughton also stressed the need to keep York Mills safe by dealing with poverty and illiteracy, as well as by keeping dangerous offenders off the streets.

Durham, 35, is a proponent of community-based policing and stricter laws on hate-related crime.

A technical support supervisor and training coordinator at Delrina Corp., Durham has been affiliated with the NDP for the past five years, following a work stint in Colombia. The high crime rate and large gap between rich and poor there prompted her to become politically involved here.

Ginsberg vies for Fort York seat

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Joel Ginsberg says he got "fed up" with levels of spending and waste at Queen's Park, so he decided to do something — run for office.

A 40-year-old lawyer, Ginsberg is one of just a handful of Jewish Progressive Conservative candidates in the Ontario election. He's running in the downtown Toronto riding of Fort York, currently held by Rosario Marchese of the NDP.

Also seeking the nod are Liberal Bob Wong, who held the seat from 1987 to 1990 and was energy and citizenship minister under former premier David Peterson, and John Steele campaigning for the Communist League.

In the last two provincial votes, the Tories were a distant third in the riding, but Ginsberg is confident that disenchantment with Bob Rae's NDP and only lukewarm support for the Liberals will mean a win for the Tories and leader Mike Harris.

Jobs and the economy are primary concerns in Fort York, Ginsberg told The CJN.

That's why, he says, Harris's "common sense revolution" makes sense. The Tories' platform of slashing provincial taxes and spending, and loosening government red tape will help nurse the economy back to health, Ginsberg believes.

The riding encompasses the downtown core, including the Toronto Islands, Chinatown, the financial district and the old Jewish Kensington area. The population is evenly divided between homeowners and tenants — many in subsidized housing — and there's a large Portuguese community.

It's bound by Toronto Harbour, west to Sherbourne Street, east along College Street to Bathurst, north to Bloor Street and south along Ossington Avenue and Dovercourt Road.

A resident of North York, Ginsberg says the Tories' plan to eliminate a tax on employers with payrolls of less than $400,000 will stimulate the many small businesses in the riding.

Joel Ginsberg

Other Conservative policies, like welfare reform and job retraining, mean "a hand up, not a handout. I'm appalled when I see panhandlers and pregnant girls begging. That just shouldn't exist. We will help those who need help the most but we will cut handouts."

Other key Tory policies for Ginsberg include balancing Ontario's budget within five years, ridding the education ministry of "dead wood" and scrapping Ontario's employment equity law.

Ontario Election '95

Elinor Caplan running hard to hold onto Oriole riding

By AMY SATTIN
CJN Staff Reporter

Elinor Caplan

Paul Sutherland

David Cox

TORONTO — It's been 10 years since Elinor Caplan was elected Oriole's Jewish MPP, and she figures voters know her pretty well.

"I'm not afraid to speak up, and they know that about me," she says after a rainy, early morning stumping session at a GO station.

Caplan, 51, is banking on her reputation for hard work and outspokenness to carry the June 8 vote.

She's running against PC candidate Paul Sutherland and David Cox for the NDP. The Green Party hopeful is Don Roebuck.

The 39,152 voters in the riding, which contains Jewish pockets off Finch Avenue West between Leslie and Don Mills, have put their trust behind Caplan three times, a trust she says she hasn't let down.

A former health minister, she points to the $20-million expansion of North York General Hospital's emergency department in 1989 and the addition of 60 long-term care beds at the North York Seniors Centre as proof of her commitment to her constituents' health care.

And she's committed to her party's stated goal to reduce the cost of doing business with the government by 50 per cent.

"Government has not always understood the need to get out of the way ... particularly with small businesses."

Giving business and constituents a break is just as important for Sutherland.

"I don't agree that we have to stay among the highest-taxed people in North America," he says.

Sutherland, 40, has been a North York councillor since 1985 and acting mayor since 1991. He says 10 years of "frustration" with the provincial government prompted him to run in Oriole.

Well known among North York residents for engineering a municipal tax freeze in 1990, Sutherland promises Ontarians similar results.

He would help cut taxes 30 per cent, eliminate the "over-governance" of the Greater Toronto Area, get rid of the employer health tax for small businesses — "a real killer" — and roll back the deficit to pre-1985 levels; all of which should stimulate the economy and attract foreign investors, he says.

For Cox, the 34-year-old NDP standard bearer, the vote boils down to protecting health care and job creation programs. He sees his opponents "in a bidding war to see who can offer you the biggest tax cuts" when services instead need to be preserved.

Cox, who has worked at Queen's Park for four years, is counting on traditional NDP support from the Peanut Plaza and Van Horne Avenue areas, as well as vote splitting between the Liberals and PCs, to win the riding.

An all-candidates meeting is scheduled for May 30 at 7:30 p.m. at Highland Junior High School, 201 Cliffwood Rd.

Schoenfeld has positive outlook after 100 years

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In a voice deepened by age, but lightened by a touch of humor, Joachim Schoenfeld reflects on his upcoming 100th birthday, which he celebrates this week with friends and family.

Sitting in his book-filled study, he makes light of the infirmities of old age, referring to his motorized scooter as "my Rolls-Royce."

In the apartment he shares with his Russian-born wife Valentina, whom he married three years ago, he makes his way from one room to another slowly, but unaided. Last year he was named honorary director of the condominium.

Born May 24, 1895 in the Galician shtetl of Sniatyn, Schoenfeld studied economics in Vienna, served in the Austrian army during World War I, and became financial director of a Polish nail and wire manufacturers' conglomerate in Warsaw in 1930.

His first wife, Ola, and their only children, Zygmunt and Stefan, along with Zygmunt's fiancee, were victims of the Holocaust.

Schoenfeld, who was imprisoned in the Janowski concentration camp, remarried after the war and set about building a new life with his second wife, Tanya. Of that process he says only that the transition "was not an easy one."

Joachim Schoenfeld

His wartime experiences are detailed in Holocaust Memoirs, a book he completed 10 years ago, at the age of 90. It was published simultaneously with his other book, Shtetl Memoirs, a rich account of everyday life in his childhood hometown.

Although Schoenfeld started committing his Holocaust memories to paper immediately after the war, it took a long time before he was convinced that anyone "would care" about a new Holocaust book.

Prompted by a niece visiting from Australia and fuelled by the need to bear witness in the face of increasing Holocaust denial, Schoenfeld "hastened to finish" the books because of his advanced age. "I never expected to live to 100," he said.

Working from notes jotted on scraps of paper, Schoenfeld alternated between one subject and the other, switching from the Holocaust to the shtetl when he needed to "relax."

He wrote the books in English, one of seven languages in which he is fluent.

Schoenfeld and his second wife spent several years in Israel, but decided to emigrate to Canada because of the climate and better job opportunities.

Schoenfeld has been back to Israel often and is a keen follower of the Middle East situation.

"Israel has been criticized for accepting some of Arafat's conditions, but I am afraid that Israel has no other way. It must reach peace — not only with the Palestinians but with [surrounding] Arab countries," he said.

Before settling in 1957 in Hamilton, where they stayed for 12 years, the Schoenfelds spent an interim period in Munich, Germany. There Schoenfeld, at the age of 60, pursued PhD studies in Economics until his immigration papers came through.

"Canada — if we forget the time of 'None is too many' and look at how it is today — is one of the best places to live for everyone," he enthuses.

Schoenfeld, who took a job as a bookkeeper within days of his arrival in Canada, worked to the age of 84.

Despite his positive attitude, he speaks wistfully of the days before telephones, televisions, radios and computers.

"Everybody had time to meet people, to think about a neighbor, a friend, a family member. Those times were the good times."

Author leads pre-Shavuot Talmud evening

TORONTO — Noted author and Jewish Book Club editor Arthur Kurzweil will lead a pre-Shavuot Talmud evening May 27 at the Bloor Jewish Community Centre.

The evening is co-sponsored by Kolel: A Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning, Kavannah and the Bloor JCC.

Kurzweil, an author of Jewish genealogical texts, is the coordinator of the Talmud Circle Project in New York, under the leadership of Rabbi Adin Steinsaltz.

BEFORE YOU CAST YOUR VOTE

•Try and make a difference.
•Remember, you do not vote for an individual, no matter how worthy. Your vote elects a Party.
•You have every right to know the Party platform or policy on issues of concern to you!
•The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms is a living document. It guarantees your equality of rights - use it!

Many groups have benefited from the equality rights provided in the Charter.
Are Jews the only identifiable group that has to continue to suffer abuse, insult and incitement to hatred and violence inflicted by Nazi hate mongers and their willing helpers?
Words have power and meaning. Incitement to hatred and violence has consequences. The most recent disaster in Oklahoma City is a horrid example of how incitement to hatred and violence translates to terrorism.
In Israel suicide bombers kill and maim innocent human beings as a result of incitement to hatred and violence by religious bigots and fanatics!

It is only 50 years after the defeat of Nazi Regime to whom human lives meant nothing. Incitement to hatred and violence through hate propaganda led to the murder of countless innocent human beings, among them, 6,000,000 Jewish people!

Why do we have to tolerate and endure this propaganda, even a day longer?

If the above concerns have been troubling you, do canvass your candidate and get to know the platform and policy of his or her Party.

Mephisto: the ultimate walking shoe puts health, fitness, comfort and appearance on equal footing

In an age of high-risk, low-return investments, many investors are turning to an increasingly popular alternative which yields optimum returns for an outlay of some $250 – $300.

That's right: for under three hundred dollars, you can enjoy maximum returns on an investment that literally beats all others in a walk.

So form-fitting and comfortable are these French hand-made shoes that their proponents (many of them world-famous celebrities) insist on wearing them everywhere, even to board meetings. Like a "little rascal", this lovable shoe keeps turning up everywhere it shouldn't. And walking miles and miles.

Most shoe manufacturers design their shoes in isolation of the foot. Mephisto, on the other hand, has analyzed the physiological needs of the human foot and developed a range of shoes, boots and sandals to meet those needs. Each pair of all-natural, all-resoleable shoes is handled by 98 different artisans.

Mephistos cost more. Or do they? When you consider that they will last you several times longer than other brands, the long-range cost is much smaller.

And what price health? We say that if we don't have our health, we don't have anything — but do we really practise what we preach? How often do we take a quiet walk before making a big decision? Do we really smell the roses, or think about doing it — someday?

Mephistos are designed with a myriad of features that can correct or alleviate almost any back problem or foot-related disorder. For walking, for golfing, for hiking, Mephistos will redefine your idea of comfort.

Mephistos are worn by celebrities, but they don't need celebrity endorsements; their market penetration has been so rapid, so "underground" in nature, that they have acquired a cult following of sorts.

The Mephisto line is available at two Mephisto boutiques downtown and at better shoe stores nationwide.

MINERAL SPA
DEAD SEA NATURAL SKIN TREATMENTS

Toronto – For generations, travelers have soaked their weary bodies in the Dead Sea allowing the mineral-rich salt water and mud to revitalize the skin and relieve tension-filled muscles. Now the benefits of the nutrient-laden Dead Sea can be enjoyed in your home with Mineral Spa Dead Sea Natural Skin Treatments. Developed in Israel by Dr. Karl Laden, former President of the US Society of Cosmetic Chemists, all formulations are based on the specially purified minerals which provide unique benefits to the skin; potassium bromide allays irritation while calcium carbonate is a natural cleanser. Combinations of sixteen botanical extracts are added to each treatment to enhance the effectiveness of the salts and minerals; goldenseal soothes sores and relieves itchiness, horsetail cleanses, and rosemary stimulates the circulation. The minerals, salts and extracts help to re-establish the skins nutrient and moisture balances.

Mineral Spa cleansers remove all traces of makeup, dirt and sebum from deep within the pores and rejuvenate the skin. The toner and masks extract any remaining impurities and constrict large pores. The scrub exfoliates dead skin and stimulates the circulation. The facial and body moisturizers penetrate the epidermis to rejuvenate cells damaged by the modern environment, relieve minor irritations and restore the skins natural moisture balance. And the luxurious bath salts, enhanced with added conditioners, relax muscles, relieve tension and leave the skin exceptionally silky smooth.

Introductory prices range from $7.00 for the 100g Beauty Bar to $29.99 for the 50ml Night Cream.
Purchase $34 to $69, receive a FREE Beauty Bar gift.
Purchase $69 to $99, receive a FREE Hand Cream gift.
Purchase over $99, choose a free gift (up to $24).

ESTHETIC DENTISTRY...
"Give yourself something to smile about!"

Peppe's winning smile is the work of Dr. Edward Philips, a Toronto dental surgeon who's given hundreds of people more to smile about. In this era of fitness and elegance, Dr. Philips has become an "Esthetician" of the smile, especially when he sees the difference it can make to people's manner and self-esteem.

A smile, says Dr. Philips, is a science and an artform. The "perfect smile" is one in which the upper edge of the teeth follow the upward curve of the lower lip line. It is also defined by measurements and proportions in relation to the other facial features

Most often the type of look that professionals ask for is not the Hollywood smile of glittering white pearly teeth, but rather a full natural smile that is used to soften difficult confrontational moments in business, says Dr. Philips. These individuals perceive a need for an improved smile to complement their business mannerisms and to address corporate structure where peer pressure dictates, "to be successful you must look successful."

An initial half-hour consultation, which costs $85 and may be covered by many dental plans, is performed to identify the problems, determine what can be done and for how much. Before-and-after computer images and molds of the teeth might be made to show what the dental makeover would look like.

Dr. Philips, who lectures on cosmetic dentistry, says new techniques have changed the face of esthetic dentistry.

"Now, many simple defects or problems can be corrected without braces, extraction or surgery that couldn't be done 15 years ago," notes Dr. Philips, who gives public talks and has appeared numerously on radio and television.

Esthetic dentistry can involve a number of procedures that vary in cost and complexity. A gingivectomy (cutting back the gums) will "lengthen" small teeth to create a fuller smile. Composite resin or porcelain veneers can be bonded to the teeth to correct shape, spacing and colour imperfections. Yellow or discoloured teeth can also be whitened.

Peppe's winning smile is the result of ten porcelain veneers placed on his upper teeth.

Steeles Memorial Chapel 68 Years of Community Involvement

Steeles Memorial Chapel was founded in 1927 as a community organization, to provide the Jewish public with dignified funerals at a reasonable cost. The earliest locations were in the heart of the Jewish community at the time, first on Bathurst St., then nearby on College St. When the community moved north, so did College Memorial Chapel, changing its name to Steeles Memorial Chapel to mark the move.

During the almost seven decades since its founding, Steeles Memorial has broadened its mandate to include ongoing support of many charities and institutions. All members of the Board of Trustees are representatives of Jewish organizations.

Although it is financially self-supporting, Steeles Memorial Chapel does not keep one penny of its profits. Once staff, maintenance and operating expenses have been accounted for, every cent of every remaining dollar is donated to charity. Members of the Board of Trustees are all volunteers from community organizations.

Among the Jewish organizations to which Steeles donates money are ORT, the Reena Foundation, the Dr. Ronald Feld Fund for Syrian Jewry, the Jewish Russian Community Centre, the Jewish Public Library, Canadian Society for Yad Vashem, and Chabad Lubavitch of Ontario. Schools, yeshivot, camps and synagogues are also among the beneficiaries.

Besides donating to organizations, Steeles Memorial offers help to needy families and individuals on an informal basis, with money for Shabbat meals, or meals for the Seder and other religious festivals. Steeles also buys phylacteries for indigent people, and supplies Meals on Wheels to the sick and aged.

For the benefit of Jewish hospital patients, Steeles has set in motion a plan to open chapels in hospitals. Currently they are building two, one at Sunnybrook and another at Branson. In time, they hope to provide every hospital in Toronto with a Jewish chapel.

At present, the Board of Trustees are also looking into the idea of a chapel at Toronto International Airport, so that observant Jews can daven Mincha and Maariv in the evening and Shacharit in the morning, or say Kaddish. In addition, such a chapel would make it easier for Jews from out of town to establish connections with the Toronto community.

Steeles Memorial also sees itself as part of the larger Canadian society. Donations are made to non-Jewish charities, such as the Salvation Army, the Canadian National Institute for the Blind, the AIDS Committee of Toronto, the Canadian Cancer Society, the Canadian Diabetes Society, and a number of other medical research foundations. Moreover, Steeles donates to Toronto General, Toronto Western, the Hospital for Sick Children and many other hospitals in the Toronto area.

It is the policy of the Board of Trustees that if a Jewish child under 18 dies, there is no cost for the funeral. At such a time, says Executive Director Ken Bodenstein, grief and the disorientation that comes from loss are more than enough to deal with; the family does not need any other problems. No other Jewish funeral chapel in North America has this policy.

In sum, Steeles Memorial is involved in every aspect of Jewish life, and at the same time innovative in its approach to tzedakah. While resources are not bottomless, no worthy cause goes unconsidered; and new ideas in charitable work are constantly being looked at.

Steeles is sensitive to the needs of the living. Currently, for example, a bereavement committee is being planned, to counsel people through grief and mourning, so that they will find it easier to reclaim their lives.

To put it in plain words: every funeral which goes to Steeles Memorial is also helping a large number and variety of worthy causes. Not only is the deceased kept alive in name, so are many organizations which improve the quality of life for the poor, the sick, children and the aged.

Steeles Memorial believes it is essential to offer options and flexibility to the bereaved. Full service is available, in which Steeles will handle every detail that must be dealt with. Alternatively, they can offer more modest, more affordable arrangements. Every attention is paid to the wishes of the bereaved.

Whatever the choice, one thing isnot flexible: all funerals are in strict accord with halachic tradition.

The President of Steeles Memorial is Mike Rogow; the Executive Director is Ken Bodenstein. Steeles Memorial Chapel is located at 350 Steeles Avenue West, in Thornhill. For information please call (905) 881-6003 or (416) 733-2000.

TO LIFE

Firehall Sports

"The Greatest Little Sports Store in All the Land"

Unionville is an historic, quaint town, with many small shops and boutiques. The Main Street contains more than 30 original buildings which have been restored and preserved. There are also several buildings of stone and board and batten and also early brick houses with Gothic style timber decoration. It is a lovely, quiet place for a family outing as there are several outdoor cafés and restaurants.

"For leisure activities"

For leisure activities during the summer months, the Firehall sells a full line of in-line blades and accessories, tennis racquets and tennis wear, golf wear, outdoor supplies and outerwear. As well the store sells water skis and wet suits.

The Firehall is most renowned for its selection of skis for winter ski enthusiasts. Of course, along with the skis they also carry all related equipment and all types of skiwear from ski suits, hats, mitts, gloves, and clothing to be worn under the ski suits.

"Not your average sports store"

The Firehall is not your average sports store. What sets them apart from the others is the friendly services provided by trained and knowledgeable staff.

Judy Schwahm, one of the owners, said "bigger is not necessarily better". You don't have to shop at a superstore for value, selection and service. You will find these at Firehall Sports. "And, we will match prices."

"The Firehall has the best selection possible at the best possible prices."

Lili Marlen's Jewish roots

By REUVEN ASSOR

War-time Rome celebrates Christmas 1944. Thousands of British soldiers on leave from the North Italian front make the air reverberate with song of love and longing. The name of the song, this time sung in English, is Lilli Marlen, and it's the very same one that the Nazi soldiers adopted as their favorite.

Even a handful of Jewish soldiers from British Mandatory Palestine sent to Rome for brief frontline training join the singing.

Who was that mysterious Lilli Marlen? Who composed the song named for her?

Unbelievable but true: the most popular song of the Nazi army stemmed from a poem a German soldier had written to his Jewish fiancee sometime during the late 1920s, while performing guard duty at the gates of a Hamburg barracks, craving the next reunion with his loved one.

Today we know the real name of that Jewish girl was not Lilli Marlen but Lilli Marle. She was a pretty actress appearing on a little-known theatre stage in Hamburg, and her soldier boyfriend was Heinz Link, composer of cabaret songs which failed to meet with success.

After leaving his Jewish fiancee, Link published a volume of poems and songs entitled An Organ Plays in Port. Again, the collection of songs was not too successful, and many people rated it as trash.

At this point, a young, attractive but not too talented singer entered the picture. She herself later admitted to having had no idea how to sing. "I used to declaim the text against background music, and I was quite happy when the synchronization ended simultaneously."

The name of that dilettante singer was Lalla Andersen. Her father was a seaman from Bremerhaven. She was a young divorcee with two children, and she was looking for work in the entertainment business.

One day, she met a young German by the name of Rudolf Zink. He decided to write the music for some of Link's librettos, including Lilli Marlen. He asked Andersen to sing them, but even coming from her lips, Link's songs left the public unmoved.

Meanwhile, Andersen fell in love with a Jewish musician, Robert Mendelsohn, and moved to Switzerland with him. More than once, she was warned by the Nazis to end the romance. When World War II broke out, she was compelled to return to Germany where she resumed her career as a second-rate singer.

In 1941, the Germans conquered Yugoslavia. Shortly afterwards, two armored divisions commanded by Erwin Rommel were sent to the North African front of Libya, as reinforcements to the Italian allies.

A problem arose as to how to keep the Rommel force ideologically sound when the Nazi broadcasting network was unable to reach that far. Radio Belgrade, which had the strongest transmitter in the region, was chosen as a relay station.

The Belgrade-based German director of army broadcasts was 2nd Lt. Karl-Heinz Reitgen. Prior to joining the army, he had been working at Radio Berlin as an announcer of programs of light music.

He made the two-day trip to the nearest German-language broadcasting station, Vienna, and asked for gramophone records. He was handed two boxes of dust-covered records which for years had been piled up in a basement.

Reitgen started broadcasting some of them and was surprised at the enthusiastic reaction generated by Lilli Marlen, presented by Lalla Andersen. Thousands of soldiers in the Rommel-led Africa Corps asked for the song over and over again, and made it their unofficial hymn.

Other Wehrmacht units in Russia, Italy and France followed suit. They used to tune in to Radio Belgrade every evening at 9:57 p.m. to hear Lilli Marlen. Nazi propaganda minister Josef Goebbels objected to the sentimental song because "it wasn't even a marching song."

The song's success did not stop behind German lines. Soon, British soldiers of Montgomery's 8th Army adopted it in an English version. From the British army, it spread to the U.S. expeditionary forces in Europe, and by the end of the war, had become a song acclaimed by friend and foe. Actress Marlene Dietrich, in entertaining American troops, played a decisive role in promoting the song to top-level popularity.

Andersen herself sang it until the last day of the war, and her career never took off. When she published her memoirs, she called it Life with One Song and stage director Reiner Fassbinder subsequently turned her book into a feature film entitled Lilli Marlen. It was screened worldwide, Israel included.

Andersen died in 1972, unaware of the tremendous success her book and the film were about to earn.

To this very day, only few people know that the favorite song of the Nazi army was dedicated by a German soldier to his Jewish girlfriend, and that the German chanteuse who gave the song its first push towards fame was the lover of a Nazi-expelled Jewish musician.

Browns killed in fire

By AMY SATTIN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Life-long Zionist Mannie Brown and his wife Libby died May 12 in a fire in their Forest Hill home. Both were 84.

The fire was caused by an electrical system malfunction, the Ontario Fire Marshall's Office said.

The Browns, who belonged to Beth Tzedec synagogue, were remembered as a quiet couple devoted to the Jewish community and to Israel.

"Mannie Brown was an indefatigable worker on behalf of the Beth Tzedec, the Toronto Jewish community and Israel," said Jack Orenstein, executive vice-president of the synagogue.

Libby Brown embroidered the shul's Torah mantles, Orenstein said.

Mannie Brown was still practising law in a one-man office at the time of his death, said son-in-law Jim Bookbinder. He was called to the bar in 1933.

Mannie, who friends said had an intellectual bent, attended weekly Talmud study classes along with his wife for 25 years.

He was founding chair of the Canadian Zionist Camps Association, a vice-president of the Canadian Zionist Federation, president of the Toronto Zionist Council and vice-president of the Toronto Board of Jewish Education. He was also once gabbai and parnass at Beth Tzedec.

"Mannie was a wonderful guy," said fellow Beth Tzedec board life member Harry Lewis, 93. "He did a lot of work and he never argued with anyone. Maybe they needed someone good up above."

The Browns leave son William, daughter Susan Bookbinder and five grandchildren.

New role for Diaspora Jewry sought by group

Delegation wants to contribute more than money

By LEORA FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

JERUSALEM — What role can Diaspora fundraisers play in an economically independent Israel? What will be the basis of Jewish solidarity once Israel achieves peace? Will North American youth have anything in common with their Israeli cousins by the turn of the century?

These were some of the questions at the heart of an unusual Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto mission to Israel this month.

The delegation — which brought some 20 high-ranking community members to Israel — was not a fundraising mission, but rather an effort to carve out a new role for Diaspora Jewry in a rapidly-changing Israel.

"The days of Israel under siege are coming to an end. There must be some new basis for our relationship with Israel, something containing real Jewish content," said Rabbi Michael Stroh of Toronto's Reform Temple Har Zion.

Mission co-chair Shoel Silver put it more bluntly. "As our money becomes less important, are we less important?" he asked.

Silver says the traditional role of Diaspora Jews — providing financial support to Israel — is not yet obsolete. "We can't turn our backs on the old role yet because we still have the mission of immigration and absorption before us and because Israel still faces a security threat. But we are getting closer to the day when these will no longer be such critical issues for Israel. And our new role is not yet defined."

During a week of meetings with politicians, journalists, volunteers and educators, the Toronto delegation explored what shape a new Diaspora-Israeli relationship might take.

"As Jews we have something to contribute to Israel besides our money," said Toronto Rabbi Wayne Allen. "We have experience in living in a pluralistic society, in volunteering and in transmission of Jewish identity in non-Orthodox frameworks."

Some Israelis who met the group expressed admiration for the religious tolerance that characterizes North American Jewry. "One member of Knesset said she envied the fact that our delegation could include Reform, Conservative and Orthodox Jews," said Allen.

But some were disappointed by the lack of interest among Israelis. "A leading journalist told us that Diaspora relations is just not an issue here. It does not generate interest, and is rarely the topic of any media coverage," said mission co-chair Judy Gwartz.

Most participants agreed the most promising grounds for a new relationship lie in the area of Jewish education. "This is the thread that unites us," Gwartz said.

Two innovative educational programs were cited as possible models. One was Elul, a Jerusalem yeshivah where secular and religious men and women study together. The other was a program that brings youth from Chicago to Israel to study religious texts together with Israelis of the same age.

The leadership mission also examined the role of the Jewish Agency, which receives the funds raised by UJA and distributes them to various programs. A special session was devoted to examining the impact of Project Renewal, the 13-year-old urban development program that twins North American communities with Israeli ones.

Representatives of all of Toronto's twin neighborhoods — Kfar Gvirol, Beit Dagan, Eilat and Hevel Eilot — expressed lavish praise for the project, saying it transformed their communities.

"The fact that these communities have been able to absorb large numbers of new immigrants so smoothly is due to the development of community leadership and social infrastructure under the aegis of Project Renewal," said Ronit Dolev, director general of the Jewish Agency department that oversees the project.

Silver pointed to Project Renewal as a successful model for Israeli-Diaspora relations. "In Project Renewal, we are directly involved in decision-making that affects Israeli communities. We are stewards of donor money, not just bankers," he said.

However, the project — never intended to run for more than 10 years — is gradually being phased out. In its place, the Jewish Agency has launched Partnership 2,000, another twinning program that matches North American communities with ones in the Negev, Galilee and Jerusalem regions.

The transition from Project Renewal to Partnerhisp 2,000 marks just one difficulty in the effort to forge a new Diaspora-Israeli relationship. "It's a long process," said Silver. "But it's encouraging that people have started to face the issues."

Alternative embassy bill introduced

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON — Incensed by U.S. Senate Majority Leader Bob Dole's legislation that would force the United States to begin building an embassy in Jerusalem next year, Senator Dianne Feinstein is about to introduce her own initiative.

A draft of Feinstein's bill removes the most controversial aspect of Dole's proposal — the requirement that the State Department begin construction on an embassy by the end of 1996 or face a loss of 50 per cent of its overseas maintenance budget.

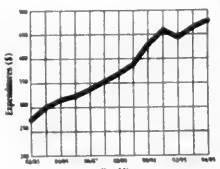
At a congressional hearing on foreign aid last week, Feinstein, who serves on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, said she believed Dole's bill would disrupt the peace process.

A draft of Feinstein's bill declares that "Jerusalem is recognized as the capital of the State of Israel" and that "the United States Embassy belongs in Jerusalem."

Our health care system in British Columbia is vital to us.

When we really need medical services, we depend on the system to take care of us. But who's taking care of health care?

High quality, affordable health care is one of our most important resources. British Columbia's health care system is one of the world's best, but like medicare systems everywhere, it faces challenges. Today, health care costs in British Columbia represent about 33 per cent of the provincial government's total annual budget. Medical services costs per person are rising quickly.



MSP Expenditures* per Subscriber

* Medical services account for approximately 92% of total MSP expenditures

We're committed to safeguarding the system for the future.

The Medical Services Commission (MSC) — which has nine members, three each representing government, the medical profession and the public — is responsible for the Medical Services Plan (MSP) that issues your CareCard. The British Columbia Medical Association (BCMA) represents the doctors of B.C., who provide many of the medical services covered by your CareCard. These partners are working together to make sure medicare is there for all British Columbians in the future.

Who's Taking Care of Health Care?

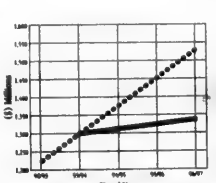
Together, the MSC and BCMA are committed to taking care of health care. Their goal is to control costs and maintain the quality of medical services in British Columbia through an important joint initiative that will make the health care system more efficient. In 1992, a five-year Working Agreement between the MSC, the government, and the BCMA took effect. The short-term goal is to save $383 million over the term of the agreement by keeping projected cost increases down. The long-term goals are even more important: to secure the quality, affordability, equity and sustainability of our health care system for the future.



Managed Growth vs Unmanaged Growth

Unmanaged Growth Managed Growth

We're not just trying one solution. We're trying a whole range of strategies.

Here are some things we are doing:

- There is an annual cap on total MSP payments to physicians for the medical services they provide their patients.
- Clinical practice guidelines are being developed to help you and your doctor choose effective and appropriate medical services when you need them, and avoid unnecessary tests and procedures.
- Steps are being taken to ensure an appropriate number of physicians are available throughout the province, to meet immediate and future needs.
- Other improvements are taking place, such as better tracking of trends in use of medical services, monitoring physicians' billing patterns, and ensuring effective use of Pharmacare resources.
- A public education program will encourage all British Columbians to join the MSC and the doctors of B.C. as partners in taking care of health care.

It's everybody's responsibility to use the health care system wisely.

Over the years, we've come to expect a lot from our health care system. We're all using more and more medical services. Nearly 50 million medical services — doctor visits, tests and other procedures — are performed every year in British Columbia. Part of the increase in health care costs is due to this rise in our rate of use. In fact, health care costs are rising faster than can be explained by population growth and aging. Research suggests that no particular group of people is to blame. Much of the increase in medical services is simply due to the fact that we're all placing greater demands on the system.

We have to use this valued resource responsibly to make sure needed services are available for future generations. All British Columbians are asked to become more responsible consumers of medical services. You can talk to your doctor about how you can help take care of health care, so it's always there to take care of you.

- The summer session of the Knesset opened. Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin told Knesset members the status of Jerusalem is not open for debate and that Israel's policy concerning the city will remain as it has been with all previous governments.

- Kol Israel reported the consumer price index rose 0.9 per cent last month, the smallest April increase in 24 years. It also reported the number of tourists had increased 15 per cent since January over the same period a year ago.

- In a ceremony at the Tel Aviv Museum, the government of Israel paid formal tribute to Count Folke Bernadotte of Sweden for his efforts at saving thousands of Jews during World War II. Bernadotte, as a special UN envoy during the time of Mandatory Palestine, was assassinated during a visit to Jerusalem.

May 16:

- The steering committee of the multilateral peace talks opened its semi-annual meeting in Montreux, Switzerland. The talks are intended to cover issues dealing with water, refugees, regional economic development, the environment and arms control.

- Rabin told a Knesset committee that negotiations with Syria appear to be deadlocked. "Israel will never agree" to the geographic parity the Syrians are demanding in security arrangements.

May 17:

- One IDF soldier was killed in an exchange of fire with terrorists in South Lebanon. Three IDF soldiers and one South Lebanese Army soldier were wounded.

- Foreign Ministry officials advised the Knesset aliyah committee they considered the rescue of Syrian Jewry to be officially completed. Of the 4,500 Jews in Syria, approximately 250 are still left, mainly in the Damascus area.

May 18:

- More than 60 members of Jordan's Parliament called for a freeze on implementing the peace treaty with Israel as a result of the Jerusalem-area expropriation.

- Media reported 229 Israeli couples were married on Lag b'Omer.

'Israelnish' produces remarkable results

By MAURY KELMAN

As a native Torontonian with a BA in English, I was under the impression that I had a fair grasp of my native language. In fact, I recall my excitement upon winning my first spelling bee in Grade 1, which stimulated me to reach even higher in my spelling career.

In any event, after moving to Israel, I discovered words and spellings I had never come across in my English language studies. I thought I knew how to spell, yet I soon learned that in Israel, a new form of spelling had been created, known as Israelnish.

Israelnish is what happens when Israelis and the English language mix. This highly volatile interaction has produced some remarkable results. Clearly, the English language will never be the same.

Menus are often a source for creative expression. Over the past couple of years, I have found myself ordering "Girlic Bread" (very unpolitically correct), followed by "Leak Soup" (guaranteed to leave you feeling cleansed), with a main course of "Hamberger Meat" (the kosher chazer), accompanied by "Pried Clean Potatoes" (Dan Quayle, take heart), and "Wild Brown Lice" (a most appetizing hair raiser).

One may choose from a variety of desserts (usually spelled "deserts" in order to induce thirst pangs): "Flesh Fluits" (a touching musical treat), "Chocolate Moose" (a carnivore's delight) or "Treifel" (served at better kosher establishments).

THE TEXTURE OF LIFE IN ISRAEL

Not to be outdone by restaurateurs, shop owners from Eilat to Metulla are attempting to broaden the English language. Moshe's Silver Jewry, Yossi's Automotive Garbage, Eksklusive Kitchenwear, Delishus Fresh Froots, Shwerma King: Store Hours 10-22, and Americann Ice Creem vie with one another in the Israeli Manufacturers' Annual Spelling Bee.

Many of these fine establishments have "saels" throughout the year. Even the American food giant Del-Monte has learned Israelnish, as I discovered recently. Their green peas contain no "additivies" and Del Monte is "registared" in Israel.

This reminded me of the time I spent in one of the Interior Ministry offices (an experience worth its own column), where I was handed an official document from "The Stare of Israel." I decided if you can't beat 'em, join 'em and signed my name "Mary Klaman."

For a long time, I wondered how it was possible for Israelis to commit such blatant errors. If I were to open a store near, let's say, Bathurst and Steeles and wanted to include a Hebrew sign, I would approach the nearest Israeli to verify the spelling. Yet, for some reason, this spellcheck process doesn't seem to happen in Israel. It's not as if there are no English speakers in this country. The last time I checked, it was difficult to find Hebrew speakers in my Jerusalem neighborhood.

In order to solve this puzzle, I decided to venture out and investigate the matter. After an approximately three-minute search for an example of Israelnish, I noticed a bright sign proudly announcing the sale of "Lamp Meat."

Never having tasted this Israeli delicacy, I sought enlightenment from the storeowner. "Lamp meat?" I queried. "Does that come with or without the shade?"

The lamb meat store owner was not pleased when I pointed out his spelling mistake. "What you can teach me about spelling?" he responded in his broken English. "I can spell much better than you English. Yes, I speak much better than you English." Apologizing for my careless folly, I excused myself and resolved to keep my spelling comments to myself in the future.

And thus, each day I uncover new versatility in the English language. From the newspapers to street and store signs, the English language displays its wondrous elasticity in this modern land of wonders. And I remain silent, hopeful that one day I, too, can reach the spelling fluency of my lamp friend, when I will tell some poor Canadian visitor, "I do spell and can speak much English better than you."

Hershon surprised by victory

their registration — all within the letter of Congress law — was a means of making Congress more democratic.

As bitter as this defeat was for Hecht, 65, he phoned Hershon early and later came down to the convention floor to publicly shake her hand.

Although he claimed the system was biased, Hecht said he would not contest the results "because I do not want to divide the community."

Hecht was doubtful that he would continue on Congress' national executive committee, which he joined about a year ago, and will resign as president of the Canada-Israel Committee, Quebec region.

Perhaps no one was as surprised by Hershon's victory, as she herself. "I was in shock," she said, and had not even prepared an acceptance speech.

Although only the second woman president (Dorothy Reitman was the first nine years ago), Hershon said she did not believe gender was an issue in the campaign.

Hershon, who has stressed she wishes to be a "teammate" who "seeks consensus," had only put her nomination for president forward the day before the deadline in April, having originally planned to run for secretary.

As for criticism from the Hecht camp that she had an unfair advantage as plenary chair (which she resigned after her nomination submission), Hershon, a 16-year Congress volunteer, said: "What does a plenary chair do? The garbage work — planning meals, booking rooms, working on registration. It's not glamorous work."

Opening her acceptance speech in Yiddish, Hershon praised Hecht as "truly caring for the community" and wished he would continue to work with Congress.

The budgetary constraints Congress faces is her number one concern, she said, and appealed to the Council of Jewish Federations (Canada), which oversees national allocations, to recognize the importance of Congress' role.

Over the 1992-95 fiscal period ending June 30, Congress took a cut of about $480,000, down to its current annual budget of just under $3.2 million.

Child Support: New Idea Spells Chaos PART 1 OF 2

The federal government appears to be prepared to introduce amendments to Canada's Divorce Act that will radically affect every parent who pays and receives child support.

Currently, periodic child support that is court ordered or agreed upon in writing is included as taxable income in the hands of the recipient (usually a woman) and deducted from the taxable income of the payer (usually a man). In cases where the parties are well represented by knowledgeable lawyers, the settlements or court orders for child support are usually fair, taking into account both the child's actual costs and the parties' respective abilities to defray those costs. They also incorporate a sophisticated tax calculation under which the husband also pays his wife's taxes arising from the support payment —a little known fact that has eluded the media.

Unfortunately, many recipient spouses didn't have proper representation or had judges who, in calculating child support, failed to make sufficient allowance for the inclusion of a support payment in the wife's taxable income.

For such women, the amounts agreed upon or ordered are unfair. Even among the women who do have support orders with a proper tax component, many cannot "set aside" that portion of their monthly support cheque to give to the government. For some it is a lack of discipline. For others, the standard of living is simply not what it used to be prior to separation. The temptation to use the tax part of the support payment for other purposes is often too hard to resist: "Mommy, why can't I have a new dress or new Walkman like my friend, Shira?" On April 30, the wife's cupboard is often bare.

One of the federal government's proposed new child support ideas is to scrap the deductibility of child support payments by the non-custodial parent and their inclusion in the recipient's income. This may produce a tax windfall to the government of a reported $300 million.

Israel downplays UN vote on Jerusalem

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — Israeli officials are downplaying the significance of the United Nations (UN) Security Council's demand last week that Israel rescind its plan to expropriate roughly 140 acres of Arab-owned land in Jerusalem.

The failed resolution "is very moderate," said Gad Ya'acobi, Israel's ambassador to the United Nations.

Officials expressed gratitude for the American veto, the first in five years.

But the Israelis also noted that in contrast to previous Security Council resolutions, the one voted on 14 to 1 did not condemn Israel.

The resolution ultimately placed before the Security Council was significantly toned down from the original draft proposed by the Palestine Liberation Organization when debate on the issue began.

The final language called upon Israel to rescind the expropriation orders and to refrain from future expropriations. It also reaffirmed support for the peace process.

And unlike most previous UN resolutions critical of Israel, it did not call on the world body to take any further action on the issue.

"The UN has a very well-known, consistent view on Jerusalem," said Ya'acobi, explaining why he was not alarmed that the world body was taking up the issue now.

Ya'acobi said representatives of several Security Council countries came to him after the vote to insist that they were still close friends of Israel and of the peace process, despite their need to take a stand on Jerusalem.

Israel had argued that with Israel and the Palestinians engaged in direct negotiations, it was inappropriate for the Security Council to discuss the issue. Negotiations on Jerusalem are scheduled to take place as part of final-status talks, beginning next year.

That was the view taken by the United States in casting its veto.

Explaining the veto, U.S. Secretary of State Warren Christopher told a Senate committee: "We thought it was important to protect the peace process and prevent institutions outside that process from taking steps that might interfere with it."

The veto prompted harsh reaction around the world.

But Israeli diplomats minimized the significance of the outcry. "It will pass," said one diplomat, speaking on the condition of anonymity. "Give it a week or two," he said, adding that he expected Israel and the Palestinians would soon agree to put the issue behind them.

Meanwhile, however, the Arab League continued its efforts to summon a special meeting of its Jerusalem committee to discuss the issue.

The committe's efforts had reportedly been slowed by the animosity between several of the invited heads of states, but the American veto is said to have renewed the initiative.

Egypt's foreign minister, on a visit in Morocco, which heads the Arab League's Jerusalem committee, condemned the veto.

"It is inappropriate that a veto be used against a resolution which aimed to defend the peace process," he told reporters Thursday.

Jordanian Foreign Minister Abdul-Karim Al-Kabariti said he summoned the American ambassador and used "very harsh language".

Mizpeh Hayamim spa offers a relaxing return to nature

By CARL ALPERT
Special to The CJN

In a country now blessed with more than two million tourists a year, there are still a few treasured spots which have not yet been discovered by overseas visitors.

One of these is the semi-isolated resort and health spa known as Mizpeh Hayamim, nestled in the mountains of the Upper Galilee 10 minutes from Safed.

The place was founded by Dr. E. Jarus, a German Jewish physician who purchased the land in 1927. He practised what today would be called naturopathy, and envisioned Mizpeh Hayamim as a retreat from the pressures of daily life.

In the shadow of Mt. Hermon, facing the Golan Heights, and looking down upon the Huleh Valley, Mizpeh Hayamim allows guests to "return to nature" with healthy vegetarian food and the opportunity for contemplation.

Israelis who used to go to the health spas of Europe have found in the 30-acre estate houses all the usual roster of treatments.

Though sometimes called a temple of health, Mizpeh Hayamim is not a sanatorium. Some come here to lose weight, others to relax and recharge their batteries. The stress is on informality, and guests spend much of their time in lounging robes. There is not a necktie in sight.

There are lectures of interest and trips around the neighborhood, which is drenched in history and mystic spirit. One can visit the nearby tomb of Rabbi Yonatan Ben Uziel, which legend has it, will bring marriage to those who visit.

There are no ashtrays at Mizpeh Hayamim. The diet is strictly vegetarian, but for those who wish it, the desserts are rich and tempting. Dr. Jarus would not have approved.

Mizpeh Hayamim draws a lot of Tel Aviv yuppies and celebrities, but hotel manager Josh Avin says every guest is a celebrity. Avin, a Sabra, studied professional hotel management in the U.S., and worked at the Konover in Miami Beach and the Mondrian in Hollywood. He came back to Israel to manage the Dan Caesarea, and two years ago took over Mizpeh Hayamim.

Recent additions are the art gallery and workshop, where Sami Samarand and his associates, Max and Hayim, produce pottery, ceramics, jewelry and silverware Hotel guests can explore their own latent artistic talents as part of their experience at Mizpeh Hayamim.

The ample grounds are the source of much of the fruit, vegetables and cheeses consumed here. There are only 80 rooms, assuring an atmosphere of intimacy.

In his day Dr. Jarus never advertised. Information was spread by word of mouth, and guests were plentiful. Even today, advertising is minimal, and so Mizpeh Hayamim is one of the secret in-places of the Israelis. One day North American tourists will discover it. Hopefully, they will not spoil it.

Music scene thrives

Israel, where in ancient times King David played the harp, is these days a land with a vibrant music scene that combines the sounds of many cultures in the new, cosmopolitan Israeli society.

The arrival of new immigrants from many countries has had a vast impact on Israel's music scene.

From the former Soviet Union came many musicians, some of whom were able to find employment with several existing orchestras, including the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra.

But many others have taken to performing in the streets. Indeed, on any given day, pedestrian malls in Tel Aviv and Jerusalem are ringing with the sounds of music from every corner.

The former Soviet musicians have also started their own musical ensembles or their own jazz or rock bands, as did the former Soviet rock star Maxim.

There is also a wide variety of musical entertainment performed in nightclubs and discos. In Israel, the big night out on the town is Thursday and nightlife does not really get going until about 9 or 10 p.m.

There are nightclubs that are popular with the Ethiopian newcomers, where the reggae beat is heard into the early hours of the morning.

"Israeli" dolphins studied by Haifa University team

More than 220 sightings of the population of some 9,300 dolphins off the Mediterranean coast of Israel have been reported to Haifa University team studying these marine mammals over the past two years. This is the first time facts and figures about "Israeli" dolphins have been published. The team, led by Oz Goffman, a graduate student in the University's department of marine civilization, presented its findings to a recent meeting of the Israel Zoological Society held in Haifa. The survey of wild dolphins, including data on stranded dolphins, has been carried out since February 1993. The objective of the dolphins research is his basic study. But Goffman also wants to be able to save the stranded dolphins in the area in the future. Most of those inspected were very thin and generally in an unhealthy state. To this end, the team is setting up a safeguard network based on volunteers. [WZPS]

Jordan-Israel peace agreement will bring joint tourist projects

There will be a Red Sea Riviera and a Lowest Point on Earth Park, among the joint tourist developments that should evolve from the historic Oct. 19 peace agreement between Israel and Jordan.

The U.S.-Jordan-Israel Trilateral Economic Committee recently convened in Jordan for its fifth meeting to discuss cooperation in tourism between Israel and Jordan.

"This is a turning point for our region and all its economic outlook," said Mordechai Benari, international relations director for Israel's tourism ministry. "It is most probable that an increase in tourism will be the first economic outcome of this new step toward peace."

Uzi Michaeli, Israel's tourism commissioner for North America, said regional tourism will rise substantially "very shortly with this new climate of friendship and cooperation between Israel and its neighbor Jordan."

The Red Sea Riviera will constitute a pedestrian promenade running along the Gulf of Aqaba from Aqaba to Eilat, with cafes, restaurants and ticket kiosks for tourist attractions in the area.

The Lowest Point on Earth Park would be a Dead Sea area venture with roads linking Israel and Jordan, health spas and visitor centres for information on historical and archaeological sites in the area.

The Trilateral Economic Committee (TTC) was led by U.S. Secretary of State Warren Christopher, Israeli Foreign Minister Shimon Peres and Jordanian Prime Minister Samer Majali.

Israel's tourism subcommittee delegation was led by ministry director Eli Gonen, with Benari and Negev Tourism Development Authority director Dany Maayan as members.

The subcommittee agreed to build a road across the Rift Valley in 1995, undertaking joint marketing efforts for tourism writers and travel agencies, preserve the natural and historic environment, develop tourism infrastructure in various areas along Jordan's Rift Valley, and create a joint tourism committee to develop a regional tourism master plan.

A Trilateral Tourism Committee comprised of the United States, Jordan and Israel will provide guidance.

Other area attractions to be built include an underwater nature reserve park in the Red Sea, where divers and other underwater sportsmen can access the famous coral reefs.

Travel Talk

Open Skies: Since the recently-augmented open skies aviation policy between the United States and Canada, numerous airlines such as Air Canada, Canadian, Delta and USAir have initiated a number of new air routes providing more convenient travel between many Canadian and American cities.

The economic impact of the open skies policy should not be underestimated. James Blanchard, the U.S. ambassador to Canada, recently cited an American study that estimated the agreement will generate $15 billion US in economic activity annually between Canada and the United States.

"This is probably the most significant aviation agreement between any two countries in the last 20 years," he said.

As new destinations and more air seats become available, and as air travel across the 49th parallel continues to increase, plans are under way to expedite customs and immigration requirements. It is envisaged that "fast lanes" at border crossings will be implemented for pre- registered frequent travellers.

Already in place at Terminal 3 at Pearson International Airport is the INSPASS program through which frequent travellers use a special plastic smart card to pass through the clearance zones quickly. Plans call for this program to be expanded to other airports in Canada.

Channel Train: Fast Eurostar trains are linking the centre of London with the centres of paris and Brussels in about three hours, making swift, smooth journeys through the Channel Tunnel at speeds of up to 100 miles per hour; 186 miles per hour in Europe.

BritRail Travel International Inc. has put together numerous all-inclusive packages from Toronto that include air, accommodation and travel. The EuropeCity tour, for example, offers London plus your choice of Paris, Brussels or Amsterdam for seven nights, $1,569 from Toronto. A seven-night London, Paris and Nice package starts at $1,769. For details, call 800-677-8585.

Museum Card in Paris: The InterMusee card allows access to 65 Paris-area museums and can be purchased for one, three or five consecutive days. Holders of the card do not have to line up at the general admission entrance. The pass is available at Paris Metro stations, participating museums and the Paris Tourist Office.

Hong Kong Walks: The view is stunning. An emerald sea flecked with whitecaps stretched out to the blue sky where great puffs of cumulus clouds drift by. On all sides, cool breezes ruffle the tall grass, covering the large rounded hills. Across the inlet, waves smash against a rocky point, and far below, a sandy beach gleams in the sun.

This picturesque scene is not some deserted South Seas island or wild and remote cape, but Hong Kong. Here in one of the world's bustling cities, the open countryside far from the masses is a short distance from the highrises and highways. This rural landscape is one of Hong Kong's most attractive aspects. Despite its reputation for urban congestion, about 80 per cent of Hong Kong's 1,000 squre kilometres is classified as rural or park area.

For information on hiking in Hong Kong, contact the Hong Kong Tourist Association, 347 Bay St., Suite 909, Toronto M5H 2R7. 416-366-2389.

Plotkin beats the bushes for Jewish festival films

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Debra Plotkin, director of Toronto's popular Jewish Film Festival, comes by her Yiddishkeit and her affinity for Jewish culture naturally.

Plotkin's father is a rabbi in her hometown of Phoenix, Ariz., her mother is the curator of the Jewish museum in Phoenix, and her sister, Janis Plotkin, heads the 15-year-old San Francisco Jewish film festival.

"In San Francisco, you just see everybody there," says Plotkin. "Young and old, gay and straight, Jewish and non-Jewish, secular and observant. There's a real sense of community. For some people, the festival provides the only Jewish holiday they have."

The numbers aren't in yet, but Plotkin estimates that the week-long Toronto festival, which has just concluded its third season, drew between 10,000 and 12,000 people to the 948-seat Bloor Street Theatre. Again, Jewish films seem to bring out an audience that Plotkin calls wonderfully diverse.

"There are a lot of young people in their 20s, and we also have a lot of people in their 80s. From our questionnaires, we've determined that over 50 per cent of our audience are not associated with a temple or synagogue.

"We get the downtown unaffiliated crowd and the North York, Willowdale, Forest Hill and Thornhill crowds and everything in between. And we're getting a lot of people who are interested in international film because, for several of our films, this was the first time they were screened in English Canada."

During the year, Plotkin attends some of the other major Jewish film festivals in Montreal, Washington, Boston, New York, London, Stockholm, Melbourne and Tel Aviv. She estimates that, along with festival producer Helen Zukerman and consultant John Stuart Katz, she watches as many as 125 films per year, from which the festival's program is drawn.

Plotkin says her biggest programming challenge is in dealing with filmmakers and distributors who prefer to withhold their films for possible inclusion in the larger and more prestigious Toronto International Film Festival each September.

Plotkin's partners behind the festival are Zukerman and Katz. Zukerman hired Plotkin in 1992, after seeing the excitement generated by San Francisco's Jewish Film Festival.

The director of the Zukerman Charitable Fund and the president of the New Israel Fund, Zukerman is still astounded at how quickly the festival has taken root as a Toronto tradition.

"We've been amazed by the reception of the community," she says. "Honestly,we just couldn't believe how hungry the community was for a Jewish film festival."

Holocaust Denial: Bigotry in the Guise of Scholarship. Edited by Sol Littman, A Simon Wiesenthal Centre Report (booklet)

Last year, the Roper Organization reported that 22 per cent of the American adults it polled said that it seemed possible that the Holocaust never happened. An additional 12 per cent weren't sure if it was possible.

How can we believe that one third of Americans are ignorant or misinformed about one of the most publicized events in modern history? In addition to these startling statistics is the growing visibility of "revisionist historians" who are trying to erase from collective memory the unparalleled Nazi atrocities.

Some of the revisionists argue that the Holocaust never happened. One of them writes that "it was all a gigantic politico-financial swindle whose beneficiaries are the State of Israel and International Zionism." With overwhelming proof to the contrary, these brazen deniers state that the gas chambers never existed. If prisoners died at Auschwitz or at other camps, it was because of disease and other quite normal wartime causes.

Some of the deniers, donning the mantle of seeming moderation, argue that the Nazis killed only a small number of Jews, largely because they were dangerous enemies of the Nazi cause. Canadian critic and journalist, Robert Fulford, has written, "Never before in the long history of anti-Semitism has anyone produced such a titanic lie."

Publicity circus

Are these falsifiers of history to be disregarded and laughed off as harmless crackpots, part of a lunatic right-wing fringe? That would be a grievous mistake. For at least two decades these purveyors of anti-Semitism have, with some measure of success, infiltrated the mainstream, gained access to talk shows and to university lecture halls and publications. Publicity hungry radio and television talk-show hosts seek them out in order to debate with survivors, arguing that different points of view have a right to be heard.

How can we explain the appeal of the revisionists? In the first place, 50 years have passed since the liberation of the death camps and there are fewer and fewer survivors to provide truthful, first-hand testimony. Secondly, there is an effort by Nazi sympathizers, and a new generation in Germany generally, to de-emphasize and sanitize the past — to cast off the burden of guilt and responsibility. Thirdly, a portion of the public gets most of its news and information from the media where increasingly the truth is blunted and events distorted in order to make dramatic or ideological points.

The booklet under review is published by the Simon Wiesenthal Centre, with the support of the Ontario Anti-Racism Secretariat, Ministry of Citizenship. Its purpose is to provide individuals, organizations and community groups with an educational resource on the subject of Holocaust denial. It describes some of the personalities and organizations in Canada and the United States involved in denial, and outlines steps that groups can take to counter the threat. Among the notorious revisionists are — Arthur Butz, David Irving, James Keegstra, John Ross Taylor and Ernst Zundel.

The major organizations involved are the Heritage Front in Canada, and in the United States the Institute for Historical Review, Liberty Lobby, Church of the Creator and The Church of Jesus Christ Christian Aryan Nations.

The two Zundel trials were a publicity circus, but research indicates that their effect was more positive than expected and that necessary information about the Holocaust was conveyed across Canada.

This booklet, lucid, helpful and cogent, should be widely read and distributed. Requests and inquiries should be directed to 416-864-9735, the Canadian office of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre, 8 King St. East, Suite 710, Toronto, Ont., M5C 1B5.

Short Film Makes Short List: The Last Call, a short film produced by Michael Bederman of North York, is a regional finalist in the 22nd annual Student Academy Awards, to be held June 11 at the Samuel Goldwyn Theatre, Los Angeles. Previous winners include Robert Zemeckis (Forrest Gump) and Spike Lee (Do The Right Thing).

Bederman, who graduates from the Tisch School of the Arts at New York University this month, has already received an award from NYU for the film, which is about inner-city police. Bederman grew up in North York and attended York Mills C.I. He has worked for Dateline NBC, Jim Henson Productions and other TV productions. He is currently involved in pre-production for his first feature film, Red Lips, a romantic comedy shooting this summer in New York City.

Hidden Child Book Awarded: The Old Brown Suitcase, a children's book by British Columbia writer Lillian Boraks-Nemetz, has won the prestigious B.C. Book prize for Best Children's Book. Along with the recognition, the author received a citation and $2,000.

The Old Brown Suitcase (Ben-Simon Publications, $11.50) tells the story of 14-year-old Slava, a hidden child who comes to Canada from Poland after evading capture by the Nazis in the Warsaw Ghetto. In her acceptance speech, Boraks-Nemetz thanked her book's heroine, Slava, and all children who come as refugees to a new land. Herself a child-survivor from the Warsaw Ghetto, Boraks-Nemetz teaches creative writing at the University of British Columbia.

In Brief: A diverse musical program against the backdrop of beautiful Georgian Bay scenery is what the Festival of the Sound, Canada's foremost chamber music festival, is all about. For information on this year's fest, July 14 to Aug.6 in Parry Sound, phone 705-746-2410.

Pianist Brahm Goldhamer appears at the St. Lawrence Centre's Jane Mallett Theatre as music director for Fiesta Latina on May 24 at 8 p.m. A native of Cornwall, Goldhamer holds the position of music director at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue.

Goldhamer also appears in concert with soprano Denise Williams at the Ford Centre for the Performing Arts, North York on June 6.. The evening of arias, art songs, folk favorites and spirituals, is being billed as a celebration of Black and Jewish music. 416-872-2222.

Festival unites Jews of all backgrounds

Zukerman says that some attendees have told her they never feel more Jewish than the week when they're at the festival.

"People can come to the festival and see the diversity of being a Jew. It's not Forest Hill, Toronto, and it's not Cote St. Luc, Montreal," she said. "For many young people, coming to the festival is a really unthreatening way to be a Jew. At most Jewish functions, you'll find people of the same politics together.

"But here, everybody is sitting together, and your politics are unimportant. You're just watching a film. There's room here for people with every point of view."

Although it has taken the lion's share of the attention, the annual film festival is only one aspect of the recently-established Toronto Jewish Film Foundation, Zukerman says.

Other activities will eventually include film production and the restoration of valuable old film footage, she said. As a separate enterprise, she also wants to bring Yiddish theatre back to Toronto.

"The problem of Jewish continuity can be attacked from 20 different angles," she said. "I like the arts, because it's fun. I'm determined to do Yiddish theatre here."

Molly Picon returns

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The life of Molly Picon, a star of vaudeville, film and the Yiddish theatre, and her meteoric rise to Broadway, Hollywood, London and theatres throughout the world, will be recreated in a musical play, Molly Picon's Return Engagement, at the Beth Tzedec Congregation on May 31 at 8 p.m.

Written by Sarah Blacher Cohen, author, lecturer and playwright, the show will feature professional entertainers Renee Matthews and Jerry Preskill. Memorable tunes of Second Avenue and musical comedy numbers from Milk and Honey and Fiddler on the Roof are the setting for Picon's clownish antics.

Roles ranging from energetic Yiddishe mama to Chaplinesque waif to forlorn ingenue demonstrate the many diverse roles Picon performed. Yiddish songs written for her and by her which became memorable include, Abi Gezunt, and Yiddel Mit'n Fiddle.

The play spans three phases of Picon's life — the impoverished Philadelphia girl who gives up school to help support her mother who encourages her to enter the theatre; the love story of her 56-year marriage to Jacob Kalich, a Galician rabbinical student turned director and script writer of 40 of her plays; and the widow determined to get on with her life.

"She embodies the resilient woman entertainer and the vibrant Yiddish cultural past," says playwright Cohen.

On May 30, at 8 p.m. Cohen will speak on her Dramatic Confrontation with Isaac Bashevis Singer at the Shaarei Shomayim Congregation.

Molly Picon's Return Engagement is presented by the Joseph and Faye Firestone Annual Concert Endowment Fund. This is the first Canadian performance. For tickets or more information, call 416-781-3511.

Alberta exploring trade links with Israel

By LEVI REIERBACH
Special to The CJN

EDMONTON — Alberta Premier Ralph Klein, with an escort from the province's Jewish community, will forge business links with Israel on a trade mission in June.

"Israel is an important member of the international economic community, and excellent opportunities exist to foster trade links between Alberta and Israel," Klein said in a memo about the trip.

"Free trade negotiations between Canada and Israel are opening doors between the two countries and the timing of the Team Alberta mission could hardly be better."

In conjunction with the premier's visit, the Calgary and Edmonton Jewish communities are arranging a charter mission, which will also involve the province's general business community.

"I am delighted that both Alberta's major Jewish communities are coordinating their mission to Israel so that it can tie up with my trade mission," said Klein.

The trip June 13 to 25 will involve Egypt, Kuwait and Lebanon, as well as Israel.

Lesley Jacobson, resource development director for the Calgary Jewish Community Council, is helping the Alberta Jewish community coordinate arrangements with the government.

She said the charter mission not only shows support for Klein's decision to go to Israel, it is also a "promotion to encourage Alberta businessmen to explore business opportunities in Israel."

Chief of mission, Art Smith, said Klein's trade agenda in Israel will include health services, oil and gas, agricultural products and electronic wares.

"He's hoping to develop synergy partnerships with Israeli companies in developing product lines," said Smith, who is also co-chair of the Alberta Economic Development Authority.

"There will be some actual contracts signed. He has a list of 20 signing agreements with corporations in Israel and the Arab states, all ready to go."

Klein will also address an international business forum in Haifa and meet with various independent business people, Smith said.

Although Israel and the Middle East in general rank only 24th on Canada's trade scale, Smith said estimates indicate that "there is much more business than that to be done."

Besides his trade agenda, the premier will also meet with senior Israeli government officials, visit the mayor of Bethlehem and the West Bank and meet with Canadian peacekeepers.

Haifa to host business forum

By CELINE MIGDAL
Special to The CJN

MONTREAL — The sixth annual Israel business forum will be held in Haifa June 19 to 22.

The conference aims to foster contacts, showcase business possibilities and facilities business cooperation, says organizer Georges E. Hazan.

"Israel has made great technological advances and needs to market this expertise and its products," said Hazan, 38, who owns a Montreal consulting firm.

Last year's business forum drew over 600 business people from various backgrounds and different countries and "this year's conference is shaping up to be even better," he said.

The first forum in 1989 in Jerusalem began what private and public sectors acknowledge as the most important business conference in Israel.

This year will feature international panels on the changing economic realities of the Middle East and Israel's role in the global economy. For more information call Hazan at (514) 395-2187.

Victims' funds donated

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — The association of banks in Switzerland has confirmed that money deposited there by Jews who later perished in the Holocaust has been donated to voluntary organizations, Israel Radio reported recently.

When no one claimed the deposits, which may have totalled tens of millions of dollars, they were given to such groups as the Red Cross, which received a $40 million donation eight years ago from the Swiss bank U.B.S.

Now, Jewish organizations say a portion of that donation belongs to those who died in the Holocaust.

"It is hard to tell exactly how much money was left in the accounts," said Noah Flug, secretary of the World Jewish Retribution Organization, a group that works to recover assets of those killed in the Holocaust. "There were numbered accounts, safe-deposit boxes, jewelry."

The total sum in the accounts of the Holocaust victims who had no family or information could be in the "tens of millions" of dollars, Flug said.

Flug said the Swiss government and banks must be pressured to find a solution.

"Fifty years after the war, many states are trying to arrange compensation for Jews who were murdered in the Holocaust. This should be done here, too."

In response to the issue, Likud MK Avraham Herschson said he would submit an urgent proposal to the Knesset calling on the government to take the matter into its own hands.

Ruby (Rochel) Permut. Peacefully after a lengthy illness, Ruby (Rochel) Permut passed away on Friday, March 3rd, 1995 (Rosh Chodesh Adar Beit) in Israel, at the age of 72.

Born and raised in Winnipeg's north end to immigrant parents, she always fought and worked towards helping other people, especially those that were down and out. She was a founding member of the Lehava Chapter of Pioneer Women, founding member of the Sa'ad Chapter of Winnipeg Women's ORT, National Board of Canadian Women's ORT, Winnipeg Jewish Council, Bnay Abraham Synagogue sisterhood president for two terms, as well as winning many community service awards from the City of Winnipeg. She worked for 25 years in Journalism and writing cooking columns for the Israelite Press, Western Jewish News, Jewish Post and the Winnipeg Free Press, as well as teaching an international cooking class to adults in the Seven Oaks School Division and in St. Boneface. She spent 10 years fund raising for the Canadian Friends of Yeshivat Sha'alvim until her aliyah in 1985. She gave many hours of volunteering to the Sharon Home, reading in Yiddish to those that could no longer and sitting and talking to those that had no one else to talk to. She also gave many hours of volunteering and understanding to the Russian immigrants when they first started to come in the mid '70's. After making aliyah, she became the "Baba" of the settlement in which she lived - a name she lived up to right to the end.

Predeceased by her parents, Chaim and Devorah Shruvel and her eldest daughter, Naomi Permut. Sadly missed by many friends and her family, she leaves to mourn her husband of almost 53 years, Chaim, her children, Judi and Danny Gottleib, grandson, Aryeh Zeev and Zvi Moshe, all of Israel, as well as her sister, Clara Chem, of Winnipeg.

Interment was in Israel at the Eretz Hachayim Cemetery beside her beloved daughter.

Memorial donations can be made to an educational fund set up in her and her late daughter's memory - the Rochel (Ruby) and Cemetery (Naomi) Permut Memorial Fund for Gan Harmony, Israel. In Canada donations are to be sent to the Press Foundation, c/o Simcha Cohen, 395 Brooke Avenue, Toronto, Ontario, M5M 2L5. All donations should be marked Gan Harmony, Israel, for this special fund.

Clock ticking on deal: Christopher

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Syrian president Hafez al-Assad knows that a peace deal must be made with Israel before next year's elections, U.S. Secretary of State Warren Christopher said Sunday.

In an interview with the Washington Post, Christopher, who is to visit the region this week, made it clear that next year's Israeli and U.S. elections mean the deadline for a peace accord between Israel and Syria should be late November 1996.

He said an Israel-Syrian deal should be culminated by a summit between Assad and Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin.

Officials in Rabin's office admit that the idea of dismantling one Jewish settlement in the first phase of Golan withdrawal, which the prime minister floated over the weekend — to the dismay of the residents of Kibbutz Elrom — had been discussed with American officials.

At the same time, they strongly deny that Israel has presented the idea in talks with Syria, but the United States may have forwarded the notion to Damascus as part of its mediations.

Syria has demanded that Israel cede more than just Druze villages in the first phase of withdrawal.

Christopher's remarks seemed to refute Syrian Foreign Minister Farouk Shara's statements that Damascus could obtain the same terms for Golan withdrawal from the Likud should it form the next government, as recent polls indicate.

"My impression," Christopher said, "is that President Assad understands that his best opportunity for an agreement is to do a deal with Rabin. The public statements

Gazit now doubts peace process

By AMY SATTIN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Shlomo Gazit does not mince words when describing the chances for peace in the Middle East.

"I am not a member of Peace Now," he says, mouth twisting into a sardonic grin. "I don't believe in peace and I have very, very big doubts about the 'now.'"

Gazit, the former director of military intelligence for the IDF, prefers instead to talk in terms of "political settlements" and the long-term picture.

Shlomo Gazit

He flew in from Washington, where he is a fellow at the federally funded United States Institute for Peace, to deliver an evening lecture at Holy Blossom Temple sponsored by the Canadian Friends of Peace Now. The CJN spoke with him at his Toronto hotel.

The Turkish-born, 69-year-old reserve major general says he is realistic about the possibility of peace in his lifetime.

"Peace is something Canada is enjoying with its southern neighbor," he said. "Peace is something that is hopefully there to stay in Western Europe. Peace won't come to the Middle East for another three of four generations."

He divides the Mideast peace process into six "parallel tracks" — the Palestinian, Syrian, Jordanian, Lebanese, inter-Arab and Egyptian tracks.

The six are interdependent, he says, and compares the negotiating process to crossing a minefield.

"Unless there is an agreement on every single one of these tracks, unless there is a reasonable solution to every single problem with each of the separate parties, then in a way we have hardly achieved anything," he said.

Ottawa accelerates war crimes cases

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO— The war crimes front heated up last week as federal authorities announced they would attempt to deport a former member of a Latvian killing unit who is visiting Canada as well as launch legal proceedings against two Canadian-based alleged war criminals.

Immigration spokesperson Pam Cullum confirmed that Konrads Kalejs, 80, a citizen of Australia, would face an immigration hearing because of his wartime activities. Kalejs was deported from the United States to Australia on April 8, 1994 following 10 years of legal battles. A U.S. Circuit Court judge pointed out that Kalejs "was a key officer in a unit that ... killed tens of thousands of innocents."

Kalejs served as a first lieutenant in the Arajs Kommando which assisted in the "systematic annihilation of the 70,000 Jews of Latvia," the U.S. court pointed out.

Documents provided by the U.S. Office of Special Investigations (OSI) show that the court found that "Kalejs and his unit had two other duties besides killing Jews in the Riga (Latvia) ghetto ... the Arajs Kommando joined the German SS in so-called anti-partisan activity, which was little more than a cover for arresting and murdering civilians ... the Arajs Kommando under the leadership of Kalejs served as guards at the Salaspils concentration camp. The conditions there were brutal."

Kalejs' hearing is set for June 1 in Toronto.

In other developments, federal authorities appear to be breaking with previously-stated government policy with the announcement last week they were taking legal steps against two more alleged Nazi war criminals. That brings to six the total number facing loss of citizenship, deportation or both.

Cullum said the deportation proceedings would commence against a landed immigrant late in the summer or early fall while denaturalization proceedings to strip another man of his citizenship are expected afterwards. Cyrus Reporter, a special assistant to Justice Minister Allan Rock, declined to identify the suspects or indicate what they are alleged to have done.

The News In Brief

CANADA

CJC Gets Standing

OTTAWA — Canadian Jewish Congress has been granted standing to make written and oral submissions to the commission of inquiry looking into the Somalia affair. The inquiry gets underway next month.

In a statement, newly-elected CJC president Goldie Hershon said Congress's information into attempts by members of violent racist groups to infilitrate the Canadian Armed Forces will be "of particular importance" to the commission.

Hate Imports

SALMON ARM, B.C. — Imports of hate literature into Canada rose by almost 400 per cent between 1990 and 1994, the Salmon Arm Coalition Against Racism (SACAR) has reported.

SACAR director David Lethbridge says last year, customs officers for the first time seized material from U.S. state militias, some of which have been linked to the Oklahoma City bombing.

SACAR said the greatest increase in seized items were those denying the Holocaust.

JCC Expansion

VANCOUVER — This city's Jewish Community Centre will expand to house child care and youth facilities.

Federal and provincial representatives announced recently that the JCC will get a grant of nearly $1 million for the project, part of an overall $11-million expansion at the centre.

The new facilities will be designed to integrate children with special needs.

'Shaar' Turns 65

WINDSOR — Congregation Shaar Hashomayim recently marked its 65th anniversary with a dinner attended by over 200 people.

Among them were 10 living past presidents and 20 past sisterhood presidents of the congregation.

Special mention was given to Charles Zalev, the shul's last living founding member.

Federal cabinet minister Herb Gray, himself a member, brought greetings.

Negev Dinner

WINNIPEG — The Jewish National Fund is busy putting finishing touches to its 43rd annual Negev Dinner, to take place here June 20. Organizers anticipate that 1,800 tickets will be sold.

This year's dinner will pay tribute to Holocaust survivors living in Winnipeg.

Keynote speaker will be CBC journalist Joe Schlesinger.

Nozick 'Woman of Year'

EDMONTON — Hadassah-WIZO here has named Norma Nozick its 1995 Woman of the Year.

Nozick, whose involvement with Hadassah goes back 48 years, was honored at a brunch last Sunday.

Proceeds will go to WIZO's Woman to Woman project, which sets up programs for single mothers and abused woman in Israel.

Zundel Targeted

TORONTO — Police explosives experts recently detonated a pipe bomb that had been mailed to Holocaust-denier Ernst Zundel.

Zundel delivered the bomb by car to a nearby police headquarters.

Bomb disposal experts took the bomb to an unoccupied area jutting into Lake Ontario, and exploded the device.

Richler's Choice

TORONTO — Novelist Mordecai Richler has chosen Michael Coren to write his biography.

The English-born Coren is the author of biographies of C.S. Lewis, G.K. Chesterton and H.G. Wells.

Coren's reported advance for the project is well into the six figures, the Toronto Star reported.

ISRAEL

Jerusalem Prize

JERUSALEM — Two Hebrew University of Jerusalem professors, Dov Nir and Michael Rabin, were awarded the prestigious Israel prize recently.

Nir was honored for, among other things, his writings on the geography of Israel.

Rabin, a computer scientist, was cited for his contributions to mathematical logic.

The prize, awarded by Israel's Ministry of Science and the Arts, recognizes a variety of scholarly and community endeavors.

AIDS Meeting

JERUSALEM — Members of Israel's AIDS Task Force visited the Knesset last week as part of observances of International AIDS Mobilization Day.

They distributed red ribbons, symbolizing solidarity with victims of the disease, to MKs and held a meeting with a Knesset committee on AIDS.

Task force members said they would push for legislation ensuring equal rights and treatment for those with AIDS and HIV.

Explosive to Arafat

JERUSALEM — An explosive device was planted in Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat's Gaza office last Tuesday, but was defused by security officers, Israeli sources said.

An Israeli source did not dismiss the possibility that the incident was planned by PA officials to rally support for Arafat.

WORLD

Aloni Attacked

NEW YORK — Shulamit Aloni, Israel's outspoken communications minister, was attacked here May 21 during a speech prior to New York's Salute to Israel Parade.

Aloni was speaking to an audience of 500 at a hotel when a man charged her on the stage and punched her in the stomach, sources said.

The attacker is known for his support of the Israeli right wing.

Aloni was shaken up but not injured.

Endorsement Revoked ...

PRAGUE — The Czech Republic has decided to revoke its endorsement of an anti-Semitic textbook, according to the Czech ambassador to the United States.

Michael Zantovsky also said action would be taken to prevent the recurrence of such an endorsement.

The text, Handbook on Church History, claims that Jews in the Middle Ages took over money-lending businesses and charged more than 100 percent interest.

... So is Prize

BONN — German President Roman Herzog last month took back a prestigious state award after it was discovered the winner was a former SS officer.

The Federal Cross of Excellence was awarded in 1983 to Dr. Hans Schwerte, chancellor of the Rhine Westfalia Technic High School, for his contributions to German studies.

But Schwerte, 85, will now have to return the award because he hid his Nazi past.

Quebecers want jobs, not independence: MP

PQ wasting time, energy and money, says Robillard

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The only independence the great majority of Quebecers want is that which comes with a job, Lucienne Robillard, the federal minister responsible for the Quebec referendum, said at the recent Canadian Jewish Congress Plenary Assembly.

"It is to that and that alone that our governments must dedicate their efforts. The only way to settle our individual and collective problems, to assure our future and our well-being, is by joining forces and collaborating together," Robillard said.

Instead, the Parti Quebecois (PQ) government is "wasting time, energy and taxpayers' money" on its separatist goals, while Quebec's "real priorities" sit on the backburner, she said..

"Quebecers know that everywhere around us, people of all walks of life, neighbors and friends, are struggling to find or keep a job. Now more than ever, it is our obligation — indeed our duty — to focus all our efforts on developing employment and the economy in Quebec," said Robillard, who is also labor minister.

Regardless of when the promised referendum is held or what the question is, Robillard said, the intent of the PQ is the separation of Quebec from the rest of Canada.

"We can only hope that when the referendum is held [Jacques] Parizeau will have the courage of his opinions and will submit his real plan to Quebecers without any camouflage, so that we can debate it honestly, which is exactly what Quebecers want."

She scoffed at Parizeau and Bloc Quebecois leader Lucien Bouchard's assertion that an economic association with Canada would be sought after a vote for sovereignty.

Lucienne Robillard

She termed Finance Minister Jean Campeau's budget speech "the latest if not the crudest" volley in a "constant stream of separatist rhetoric" no one wants.

Quebecers do not need to separate to ensure their francophone identity and, in fact, being part of Canada had provided the province with the means to protect the French culture, she said.

"Far from being the chains that proponents of separation describe it, Canada is already a viable and dynamic association that opens all avenues to us and makes all our aspirations possible," she said.

The vast majority of Quebecers are tired of the "futile and endless fighting" between Quebec and Ottawa, she said. "What we want ... is elected representatives to cooperate and work together to put in place new ways of doing things together, to ensure collectively the future of Quebec within Canada."

As welcome as her pro-Canada message was, it was Robillard's fluent Hebrew that endeared her to the audience. She learned the language as a youth worker on a kibbutz between 1969-72.

Robillard gave the keynote address at the luncheon where Goldie Hershon was officially installed as Congress president.

Although invited, no PQ or Bloc members attended that event. Three PQ MNAs, including Public Security Minister Serge Menard and Tourism Minister Rita Dionne-Marsolais, and Bloc immigration critic Osvaldo Nunez, as well as Montreal Mayor Pierre Bourque, attended a reception the night before in honor of Jerusalem 3000 and bidding farewell to Israeli Ambassador Itzhak Shelef.

CJC community relations director David Sultan said invitations were sent to all federal and Quebec parties.

Quebec's seniors told to plan for economic uncertainty

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Quebec's aging Jewish community should be planning for ways to cope with an eroding economic base and continued political uncertainty, a former chief of staff to then prime minister Brian Mulroney told a forum of the recent Canadian Jewish Congress Plenary Assembly.

That could even include a form of "equalization payments" between Jewish communities, Stanley Hartt said.

But as well, "Quebec Jewry has to focus on what is excellent," said Hartt, who also served as deputy finance minister. "The Jewish community should be anticipating this trend and planning for it.

Hartt said it was a mistake to blame the recession for current economic ills.

A more mobile Canadian economy and the technological revolution has made for a much more mobile work force, he said — and the trend is unstoppable.

In the case of Quebec, said Hartt, even traditional Jewish businesses such as the garment industry have gone hi-tech.

Younger Jews are more mobile and can set up shop anywhere. The "best and brightest" see no necessary reason to stay, he said.

Hartt noted that while "most of the costs of separation have already been suffered," there has been no "countervailing" immigration to offset the "out-migration."

Hartt's pessimistic view was definitely not shared by panelist Robert Vineberg, a Montreal business lawyer and chair-elect of the local Combined Jewish Appeal.

According to Vineberg, there has been no net out-flow of Jews from Quebec, with 5,000 Jews moving to Montreal and 2,700 away to other provinces over the last five years.

While it is true, he said, that traditional "Jewish" industries like textiles and retailing have suffered, more Jews have gained entree into banking, insurance and corporate Canada than ever before, sectors once off limits to Jews.

"There is a growing recognition in Canada's executive world that merit is more important than religion," Vineberg said.

More and more, Vineberg said, Jews are also forming public companies and gaining access to more capital markets.

In the mind of Halifax panelist Mark Rosen, who works for Coopers & Lybrand Ltd., none of this has helped the Jews of Atlantic Canada.

For them, said, Rosen, a member of the Atlantic Jewish Council, the recession has had a devastating impact on a once vibrant Jewish community.

"The children are simply leaving town, not to return," he said. "It has had a sobering impact."

Saint John, N.B.'s Jewish community once numbered 300 to 400 and is now down to 60 families, Rosen said, and "continuity is on the decline. Young people are seeking their opportunities elsewhere."

Other small communities like Glace Bay and Sidney, N.S., have also been virtually "decimated" by the recession, he said.

Alan Rose honored at plenary

MONTREAL — This year's Canadian Jewish Congress plenary honored former executive vice-president Alan Rose.

Rose was Congress' "ambassador" to the non-Jewish world abroad for 25 years, until his retirement last year at age 74.

But speakers at a tribute reception said Rose, more significantly, has represented an eloquent and dignified voice fighting for the most basic human rights of the "little man" and Soviet and Ethiopian Jews with equal vigor, two of the causes that dominated the world Jewish agenda during his term.

"He has been an unparalleled national resource," former Congress president Irving Abella told a packed room. "He has been the public face of Congress throughout the world."

Wendy Eisen, a Soviet Jewry activist who used the occasion to launch her book, Count Us In: the Struggle to Free Soviet Jews, singled out Rose as the man who galvanized Congress in 1970 into moving Soviet Jewry away from being an issue of "quiet diplomacy" — notwithstanding already vocal student activism — into a movement of marches and lobbying efforts on Parliament Hill.

It was Rose, recalled Eisen, who at a Soviet Jewry rally in Ottawa steered then External Affairs minister Mitchell Sharp towards the protestors.

Sharp ended up providing words of support on behalf of the Canadian government.

Rose's famous diplomatic touch "made Congress the central resource for Soviet Jewry advocacy," Eisen said. Rose played a part in the formation of the women's Group of 35 that campaigned effectively for the freedom of Soviet Jewish dissidents, including Natan Sharansky.

Rose, who upon retirement became a member of the Immigration and Refugee Board but has been ill recently, first paid tribute to his wife, Joyce, and sister-in-law Renee.

Then he gave a vivid portrait of a life marked by drama and fulfilment.

Charles Bronfman lauded Rose succinctly.

"Thank you for all you have done for liberty and human rights," he said.

Resolutions passed

MONTREAL — The resolutions carried at the recent Canadian Jewish Congress plenary included the following:

Be receptive to the "evolution" of the federal political system;

Set aside a national remembrance day for Jews who died serving in the Armed Forces;

Seek to work with Canadian-Arab communities on issues of mutual concern, such as human rights, multiculturalism, social and economic justice and the promotion of understanding of each other's communities;

Establish an independent committee to "enhance the democratic process within the organization" in light of "fewer and fewer" Canadian Jews being involved in Congress' "key decision-making."

Have Congress expand the activities of its Ottawa office and urge the Canadian government to speed up the pursuit of alleged Nazi war criminals and step up humanitarian aid efforts for victims of and pursuit of perpetrators of international war crimes.

Other resolutions included those in support of multiculturalism, religious accommodation, aboriginal rights and rapprochement with francophone populations outside Quebec.

Giving.

We have two long established traditions that tell you something important about Benjamin's. One is that we extend support to the needy and to community organizations. The second is that we don't talk about it.

We don't boast about our generosity because we think that would be a corruption of the mitzvah of commemorating life. Publicly listing contributions and subsidies would make the sacred duties we perform as fourth generation Jewish Funeral Directors appear as meaningless as an elaborate fund-raising operation.

Organizations that publicize their giving are invariably looking for reflected glory and direct gain. Perhaps Jewish custom discourages speaking of charitable giving precisely because of fears that giving would be reduced to little more than commercial expediency.

Our practice not to discuss our charitable activities reveals more about Benjamin's than a full-page ad in a community newspaper ever could.

Allegations against Dueck revealed by government

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — His St. Catharines neighbors may know him as the polite man next door.

But government documents filed in Federal Court recently set out a disturbing list of atrocities in which Johann Dueck allegedly participated during World War II.

An ethnic German born in Ukraine, Dueck, 76, was a senior police officer in the Selidovka District who collaborated with the Nazis in murdering civilians, Soviet PoWs and women, the documents claim.

Late in 1941, Dueck and other police officers "participated in the execution of three members of the [Jewish] Kovalevsky family, as well as the former militiaman Pridatko, at trenches ... in the old centre of Selidovka," the Justice Department documents contend.

Dueck also "was the senior policeman present at the execution by the Selidovka Police of approximately 15 persons ... In the late fall of 1941, the Selidovka District Police, in [cooperation with] German forces, [executed] seven male prisoners who were wearing Soviet Red Army uniforms. [Dueck] was one of the senior policemen present and acted as interpreter for the Germans."

In December 1941, the Selidovka police cooperated with German forces in executing approximately nine people, including two women and several men in soldiers' uniforms. The documents allege Dueck again "was one of the senior policemen present and acted as interpreter for the Germans."

The documents go on to claim that in the fall of 1942, Dueck ordered police to surround an area in which German forces executed eight to 10 prisoners.

In the winter of 1942-43, when the Soviet army temporarily broke through the front, Selidovka police arrested about 30 civilians and held them as hostages in a mill.

"When other villagers attempted to bring food and water to the hostages, [Dueck] struck at the villagers with his whip while the other policemen struck the villagers with the butts of their rifles. [Dueck] was the senior policeman present and was heard issuing orders to the other policemen," the documents allege.

Dueck evacuated the area in September 1943, as Soviet forces advanced, and on June 6, 1944, he applied for German citizenship.

Dueck arrived in Canada in 1948 and became a Canadian citizen in 1957.

He faces loss of citizenship and deportation for allegedly lying about his wartime activities.

Eisen to get award

TORONTO — A York University professor is this year's recipient of the prestigious Ben Sadowski Award of Merit.

The award is presented annually by the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto to an outstanding community leader.

Sydney Eisen teaches history and humanities, and he is a former Faculty of Arts dean at York. He was instrumental in establishing the university's Jewish Studies program.

Eisen also helped to found the Centre for Jewish Studies and the Jewish Teachers' Education Program.

He has also been active with the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, Associated Hebrew Schools, the federation and the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education.

One of his major objectives is to find funds for the expansion of Jewish studies at York. "We started the first course in Sephardi culture in this region and we would like to expand it," he said. "We would also like to do something significant in the Holocaust area."

Sydney Eisen

Eisen will be honored at the federation's annual meeting on June 7.

Bloor JCC launches $5-million campaign

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — With the raising of a glass and a "L'chayim," fund-raisers at the Bloor Jewish Community Centre (Bloor JCC) launched a $5-million campaign last week.

The money will "preserve and enhance the downtown community," the 30-odd volunteers and staffers who gathered in the centre's lounge were told.

The $5-million goal is attainable, asserted Mark Sarner, one of three campaign co-chairs.

The campaign is expected to last two to three years. Three million dollars is earmarked for payment of a mortgage, the Bloor JCC's share of the now defunct Jewish Community Centre's (JCC) approximately $10-million bank debt. Another $1 million will go to renovate the facility while the last million is slotted for programming.

The campaign launch came less than two weeks after the final reorganization of the old JCC. A members group now controls the Bloor Street facility.

Campaign co-chair Frank Jacobs said the Bloor JCC has already received $600,000 in pledges.

Jacobs said despite the financial crisis over the past years, membership at Bloor "is as good as in its healthiest day," when it stood at more than 4,000.

Hosek finds her niche in Liberal backrooms

Scene in Ottawa

By RICHARD CLEROUX

OTTAWA — The most influential woman in Prime Minister Jean Chretien's office is Chaviva Hosek, a 48-year-old former Ontario cabinet minister, women's activist and one-time University of Toronto English professor.

As the prime minister's director of policy and research, a job she has held for the past 18 months, Hosek is in on every major policy decision by the Liberal government, whether it's the impact of cutbacks in the latest budget, social affairs planning or a new foreign policy objective.

Hosek arrived in Ottawa in 1990, after a somewhat controversial career in Ontario provincial politics.

As director of research for the Liberal caucus she quickly earned a reputation in Ottawa circles as "a policy superwonk" and had a major hand in preparing the Liberals' 1993 federal election platform. Along with Paul Martin, she co-authored the Liberals' famous 100-page Red Book of election promises.

Hosek's influence on Chretien is pervasive. She is regarded by many as the sharpest mind in the Prime Minister's Office.

That's why Hosek is usually invited along on Chretien's frequent foreign trips, making sure that he understands exactly what he is getting Canada into during talks with world leaders.

Chretien has a tendency to shoot straight from the heart. With Hosek around, some of the shooting comes from the mind too.

Hosek came by her policy expertise honestly. Prior to the election, she toured the country as co-chair of the party's platform committee, listening to thousands of people at town hall meetings, where she got a good feel for what people were saying, what would go over well during the campaign.

Born Oct. 6, 1946 in Chomutov, Czechoslovakia, the daughter of Emil Hosek and Hedy Weiss, she came with the family to Montreal when she was six and attended the Adath Israel Academy. She graduated from McGill University in 1967 with an honors degree in English and went on to earn a master's degree and a PhD in English and American literature from Harvard University.

Back in Canada, she began her academic career and became associate professor of English at Victoria College at the University of Toronto in 1978. She also served in an administrative capacity, as a member of the Governing Council from 1983 to 1986, and in 1984 became the first-ever woman chair of the academic affairs committee. That year she was named B'nai Brith Woman of the Year.

Hosek emerged as a nationally-known Canadian women's activist in 1984, serving for the next two years as president of the National Action Committee (NAC) on the Status of Women. She had been on NAC's executive committee since 1981. As well, she became a partner in the financial firm Gordon Capital Corp., specializing in pension finance.

In 1987, Hosek was lured into politics by David Peterson's Ontario Liberals, was elected Liberal MPP for Oakwood, and quickly appointed Liberal housing minister. The Liberals touted her as a rising political superstar.

It was a high-profile job for which the publicity-shy Hosek was totally unprepared. Ontario was in the midst of a housing boom and Hosek was always in the spotlight. She quickly became a favorite target of the Opposition, and made one political flub after another.

On one occasion, the news media at Queen's Park reported that she had toured a shelter for the homeless wearing an expensive coat and leather skirt, and then avoided a news conference by flying off to Italy for a vacation. It didn't help her image.

Later she would admit she made mistakes, but many were the kind of gaffes a first-time cabinet minister makes.

She became caught up, like other Ontario Liberal ministers, in the Patti Starr scandal, and was unceremoniously dumped from cabinet in 1989.

Chaviva Hosek

She took flight to the safety of the political backrooms of Ottawa, even though it meant commuting back and forth to be with her husband, Toronto consultant Alan Pearson, on weekends and whenever else she can.

They gave her the big Langevin Block office Mila Mulroney used to have just down the hall from the prime minister.

She still shuns the limelight and refuses to give interviews.

However, on March 8 Hosek spoke at a private gathering for senior women from the Prime Minister's Office and the Privy Council Office, held in the Langevin Block cafeteria to mark International Women's Day.

Here, surrounded by other women who had "made it" — people she felt she could trust — Hosek talked openly, with candor and humor, about her life and her political career, and what it takes for a woman to get ahead.

She had learned, she said, while in the academic world, how little issues must be dealt with while they are small, before they become big, difficult issues. Hosek was speaking from experience. She had learned the hard way.

Hosek seems to have found her niche in Ottawa. And the Liberals are happy to have her.

The Federation of Teachers in Hebrew School Respond to A. Katz letter

Every Shabbat, before the Musaf service, we read the prayer of Y'kum Purkan which says, in part: "And all those who occupy themselves faithfully with the service of the community, may The Holy One, Blessed Be He, provide them with their reward ..."

This prayer was formulated by our Rabbis to encourage dedicated Jewish communal servants to continue in their work, in spite of those in every location and in every generation who would demean them, berate them and insult them. At the present time in our city, the prayer must be said each week in recognition of Mr. A. Katz of Toronto.

Mr. Katz, in his letter to The CJN of May 4, expresses his anger at the teachers of United Congregational School who went out on strike before Pesach after waiting for more than three years for the school to negotiate a contract with them. THE fact is that an increase in salary was not even an issue which the Teachers Federation had raised in their contract proposals with UCS. Nonetheless, Mr. Katz declares that the teachers "... are driven by greed and nothing else. Seven out of the nine teachers at UCS have jobs in other schools and their part-time position is an income supplement ... In these difficult times when people should be happy they have a job, these teachers are holding on to two jobs and trying to milk the parents and the school to the maximum."

I assume that Mr. Katz is not suggesting that the United Congregational Schools should pay a full-time salary to these teachers in order that they should not have to be "holding on to two jobs"; nor, I assume, is he suggesting that United Congregational Schools close its doors rather than hire part-time teachers who are insolent enough to have a full-time job elsewhere.

No, I assume that Mr. Katz is suggesting that these trivial employees, these minor functionaries in the community, should shut up and take what the school, in its largesse, is willing to provide. It is, after all, only "greed" which motivates them. Any self-respecting working person should be able to support his/her family on a single salary, should she/not not? The fact that over 60% of married women in Canada must work to supplement income is probably only a sign of poor family budgeting. No?

A statistic several years old suggests that an average Canadian family of four requires an annual income of $55,000 to cover its essential costs each year. And that does not take into account the higher cost of living in Toronto; or the cost of day school education; or synagogue dues; or UJA contributions; or kosher food. A unionized day school teacher in Toronto with a four-year B.A. and Hebrew Teachers Certification and five years of experience can make a full salary of as much as $47,000 a year. And where is the rest supposed to come from? Just greed, Mr. Katz tells us.

Teachers in the Jewish school systems in Toronto are members of this community. We are professionals who take pride in the work we do. We are not teaching simply because Mr. Katz is too busy with significant work to put in a few hours a week dispensing his expertise in Judaica to children; we teach because we are knowledgeable, because we are trained, because we are dedicated.

And we are, on the whole, fairly paid. No teacher expects the Jewish community to provide us with the pay of doctors and lawyers. But we do expect to be paid negotiation of the Hebrew Teachers Federation and school administrations to be paid more or less as other teachers are paid in the city. This professional equity is certainly one of the reasons that Tornto has succeeded in attracting such a large number of trained, professional educators, without whom the dozens of Jewish educational institutions in this city could not hope to maintain the standards of excellence for which our city is now well-known around the world.

We are school teachers. We do not expect to be invited to sit on leadership boards with the businessmen and the politicians. We are not waiitng for tribute dinners or apppreciation days. But we will not be taken for granted. We will not be treated with the arrogance of Mr. Katz. We will not be neglected by a school board for three-and-a-half years and then be told that we are "reckless and irresponsible" for demanding the same kind of recognition as any other workers in any other job.

We are community servants, Mr. Katz, not community slaves. We are grateful to you for providing us with the opportnity to practice our profession, but we will be treated with due courtesy, with due consideration and with due respect.

And we're not asking you for that, Mr. Katz. We're telling you.

Not even for Jerusalem

The parliamentary tangle in the Knesset last week left most observers shaking their heads as much in sadness as in disbelief. The three-member Communist Party (Hadash) and the two-member Arab Democratic Party (ADP) each tabled a motion of non-confidence over the government's expropriation of Arab-owned land in East Jerusalem. The opposition leader stated that he would support the motions of the two "fringe" parties.

To prevent the fall of his government, Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin suspended the expropriations policy. The Communists withdrew their motion; the ADP motion was repelled with the abstention of the opposition.

Even the hardened, cynical Israeli press seemed incredulous. While some of the media rallied predictably in defence of partisan causes, in the main, they heaped scorn on both major parties. The media's attitude was best expressed by Moti Basok in Davar: "Everyone — except perhaps Hadash and the ADP — came out of the land expropriation affair badly."

Electoral reform, in the broadest sense, is needed in Israel. The strictly proportional system is anachronistic. Equally important, the no holds barred, often vicious culture of party politics can be harmful to the larger good.

The fact that the non-confidence votes took place virtually on the eve of Yom Yerushalayim served only to highlight their incongruity. Not even for Jerusalem could the parties set aside narrow self-interest.

Shavuot

During the Pesach seder we are urged by the sages to "see ourselves as if each one of us took part in the exodus from Egypt." On Shavuot, however, the Torah carries this transcendent personal experience to an even higher level. "For not with your generation alone did I establish this covenant and make this promise. But rather, with you who are here today standing before your God, and also with those who are not here today." (Deuteronomy 29:13)

In other words, in a certain sense, we were all at Mount Sinai some 3500 years ago, receiving into our hearts the timeless imprint of a moral, community-minded, responsible and fulfilling way of life.

A fractious rabble of former slaves, oppressed and humiliated for over 400 years, was bonded into a free people. But the first steps toward freedom — indeed the first steps for any people in any place, in any generation and in any time — was the rule of law. In fact, the newly liberated slaves accepted the law even before they had actually heard all of its burdens and requirements. Such was the significance of the moment.

Three and half millennia later, however, much of that moment has been lost to us through the relentless, wearying and often cruel attrition of time and of history.

Because we were all there, perhaps if we tried, we could retrieve even a small fragment of its memory?

"And on the third day, with the arrival of morning, there was thunder and lightning; a heavy cloud settled upon the mountain; and the shofar was blasting very loud. Everyone in the camp trembled with fear. And Mount Sinai was enveloped in smoke; because God descended onto the mountain in the midst of fire; and the smoke rose from it as if from a furnace. And the entire mountain trembled and quaked ..." (Exodus 19:16)

The retrieval of even that small fragment of memory is the purpose of Shavuot. Chag sameach.

Jerusalem land not confiscated

Re: "Knesset presses ahead with land appropriation," (CJN, May 18). Though your report from your staff and wire service mentioned appropriation four times, it mentioned confiscation eight times.

While a government can appropriate land for its special needs, democratic countries prefer the word expropriate, which your report used five times. The normal procedure is to expropriate and negotiate a fair value settlement with the right of the citizen to go to court if the offer by government of compensation is considered inadequate.

You say eight times that Israel sought to confiscate land, much of it held by Arabs; confiscate normally means taking with no compensation. The dictionary says confiscation is stealing, robbery. In that case, left-wingers in Israel would be right to oppose it as unfair.

When The CJN eight times says land is to be confiscated, it is giving world anti-Semites ammunition.

Land anywhere is a sensitive issue when it is to be taken by any government. Jews have been buying land in Israel for a century and paying top dollar. By not using proper language you do damage.

Why he fought Nazis in World War II

Irving Abella (May 4) hasn't got it completely right, in my case.

Because of the prevalent anti-Semitism in Canada, which he correctly describes, I did not volunteer for Canada. I volunteered because I had no choice but to help put a stop to German Nazism as a Jew. I'm glad that I did not miss the unique opportunity to participate. Those who did not do so missed a chance of a lifetime.

Those who were killed in action should not be forgotten, ever. They deserve the gratitude of every survivor. Our grandchildren deserve their remembrance. It will stand them in good stead.

It is regrettable that for 50 years, the Jewish community has chosen to not commemorate their names to help our children remember.

Rabbi did not salute with left hand

In your VE-day article, May 4, one page shows Highlanders walking down a Montreal street. The other page shows a rabbi saluting. I thought that the Highlanders were correct but I had to confirm with my doctor about the rabbi. We have agreed that the negative has been reversed, thus creating the impression that the rabbi was saluting with his left hand. As a former Warrants Officer, this didn't seem right and my doctor agrees with me. My name is Arthur and my doctor is Eli, the rabbi's kid brother.

Deplores lack of recognition for vets

In Toronto, the 50th anniversary of VE-Day (May 8) came and went and left many Jewish veterans with the feeling that they had been ignored by the Jewish community. Certainly many organizations and synagogues held special functions commemorating the liberation of the death camps but, in contrast, honoring the Jewish veterans who played a part in the liberation process appear to be tokenism. To the best of my knowledge, the only shul in this area that held a service solely dedicated to the veterans of World War II was in Hamilton.

On the other hand, veteran observances organized by non-Jewish organizations were ubiquitous. Most Toronto churches held special services on Sunday, May 7 as did other non-religious groups.

There is little doubt that the 50th anniversary of VE-Day marks the final phase of World War II for the veterans. I doubt if there will be very many of us around for the 60th. Thus, the Jewish community, in its desire to perpetuate the memory of the Holocaust, has forgotten those responsible for its conclusion.

Questions views of Hebrew columnist

Congratulations on the inauguration of a Hebrew column in The CJN. It will fill a need long overlooked.

Gidi Koren, in his last paragraph, says he "doesn't want to sound anti-anyone," but his writing proves exactly the opposite. He bemoans the mentality of our enemies in the Middle East in a manner that is neither balanced, neutral nor constructive. No, it's true that we are not so fortunate as to have, say, nice Scandinavians as our neighbors. But Mr. Koren seems to be suggesting that since our enemies are less than civilized (in his view) and we are so superior, somehow the peace will be less than we deserve.

He describes Arabs as those who practise female mutilation, though this has never been associated with Palestinians. And he describes Jews as possessed of the finest moral standards, charity, pity, etc. To define the enemy in terms that dehumanize, while claiming one's own superiority, is to invite one side to justify all manner of treatments to those labeled "less than human." This should ring a bell. To define ourselves in such elevated self-congratulatory terms is to forget that the first groups which made throwing stones at cars a success shouted "Shabbes" as they did so. As recently as March, the people torching bank machines in Jerusalem for reasons to do with religious extremism were yeshivah students.

We have to make peace with Arabs. Their writings could disclose quotations of wholesome morality as well as ours. Our extremists also are likely to justify ignoring their highest principles when it suits their needs. And certainly let's not feed intolerance while claiming neutrality.

Counting the days to Shavuot

By RABBI JAY H. KELMAN

The holiday of Shavuot will be celebrated this year starting Saturday night, June 3, corresponding to the sixth day of the Hebrew month of Sivan. This should come as no great surprise, except that the actual date for Shavuot is never explicitly mentioned in the Torah.

The Torah tells us that we are to count the days starting from the second day of Pesach. The 50th day, which now falls on the sixth of Sivan, is to be celebrated as Shavuot, one of the three pilgrim festivals. However there were times when this was not so.

It was only in the fourth century that the months of Nissan and Iyar (the two intervening months between Pesach and Shavuot) were fixed at 30 and 29 days respectively. Prior to that, Nissan and Iyar could both have had either 29 or 30 days. Shavuot could therefore theoretically fall on any one of three days from the 5th to the 7th of Sivan. If both months had 29 days, Shavuot would fall on the 7th of Sivan and if both had 30 days, 50 days after Pesach would be the 5th of Sivan. The Talmud tells us that Shavuot was in fact often celebrated on the fifth or seventh of Sivan, in addition to the sixth.

If Shavuot commemorates the acceptance by the Jewish people of the Torah, we would expect to celebrate it on the same day of the Hebrew month each and every year. Interestingly enough, when we look at the Torah, nowhere is Shavuot described as the day of the giving of the Torah. In fact Abarbanel (15th century Spanish exegete) claims that the holiday of Shavuot has nothing to do with receiving the Torah, though by coincidence the dates coipcide.

In fact there is a talmudic dispute as to whether we received the Torah on the sixth or seventh of Sivan. So it could be that the people of Israel, who celebrate Shavuot only on the sixth of Sivan, may not even be celebrating on the same day as the Torah was received. The Torah only tells us that the Jews arrived in the Sinai desert in the month of Sivan and soon afterwards received the Ten Commandments.

In the Torah, Shavuot is described in agricultural terms as chag hakatzir, the harvest festival, or as the day for bringing bikurim, the first harvest and fruits. After the farmer has worked hard and finally begins to see some results he is told to take some time off, journey to Jerusalem and bring the first fruits of his labor to the Beit Hamikdash in Jerusalem.

The farmer must remember that while without our efforts we cannot be productive, all that we have is really a blessing from G-d. Shavuot is therefore a day when we thank G-d for our material blessings and affirm our faith in G-d by taking time off during the "busy" season. In fact the rabbis always associated farming with faith. When one farms, one has faith that nature, which is beyond man's control, will also do its part. By properly observing Shavuot, we affirm that G-d is the master of nature.

Shavuot has always been understood as a day we affirmed our general faith in G-d by accepting the Torah. It is the "time of the giving of the Torah." So why isn't this extremely important date mentioned in the Torah in connection with Shavuot? In fact, as we have seen, the day we celebrate Shavuot, the sixth of Sivan, may not even be the day we received the Torah.

In enumerating the 613 biblical mitzvot that a Jew must observe, there are those who count the belief in the existence of G-d amongst them. However, without this basic belief, Judaism is meaningless. One can only talk about mitzvot — commandments — if one believes in a commander.

Illustration from the exhibition, A New Book of Ruth: Calligraphy and Illustration by Sharon Binder, at the Yeshiva University Museum through July 31, 1995.

"But Ruth held fast to her.

And she (Naomi) said
Behold,
Your sister-in-law has returned to her people
And to her Gods.
Follow your sister-in-law.

And Ruth said
Do not urge me to leave you,
Or to turn away from following you.
For wherever you go,
I will go.
Where you make your home,
I will make my home.
Your people
Will be my people.
Your God
Will be my God.
Where you die
I will die
And there will I be buried.
This I ask of God
That only death come ever between us."

Book of Ruth 1:15 – 17

So too, only once we accept the Torah can we begin to discuss its meaning. It is superstitious to mention that the Torah was accepted on Shavuot, because our observance of the holiday itself testifies to its acceptance. In reality, we are celebrating Shavuot every day by following the dictates of Judaism. Acceptance of the Torah is not and cannot be limited to one day. Rather we reaffirm our acceptance every day.

This also explains why there are no mitzvot specific to the holiday of Shavuot. We eat matzah to commemorate the exodus, sit in a sukkah to remind ourselves of our wandering in the desert. However Shavuot cannot be limited to a particular aspect of Judaism because it represents our acceptance of all the mitzvot.

Another very different debate arose between the Zedukim (a sect that arose during Temple times that disputed many of the rabbinic interpretations of the Bible) and the Prushim (those who accepted the rabbinic teachings) regarding the day of the week (and hence the day of the month) on which Shavuot falls.

In describing the beginning of the 50-day count, the Torah uses the expression mimacharat haShabbat (the day after the Shabbat). The Zedukim rejected the traditional interpretation of the Bible, which understands that "Shabbat" in this context refers to the first day of Pesach. They claimed it meant the day after a regular Shabbat, meaning Sunday. They therefore attempted to manipulate the calendar so that Shavuot would fall on a Sunday. It was due to this manipulation that the rabbis had to send messengers to Diaspora communities informing them of the correct day of this (and other) holidays. Since it often took a few weeks for the messengers to arrive, there was doubt as to which day was the correct one to observe, and due to the uncertainty as to which day was correct, two days were observed.

Another interesting issue surrounding the actual day of Shavuot concerns the reason it has to be celebrated for two days in the Diaspora. While it might take two or three weeks for messengers to arrive announcing the proper day of the new moon and hence the correct day to observe the holidays, by the 50th day from Passover all doubt would have been cleared up as to the proper day of the month. Therefore there should be no need for a second day in the Diaspora. Apparently the rabbis did not want to distinguish between the various holidays and mandated that all biblical holidays would be kept for two days in the Diaspora. This also helped keep the important distinction between Israel and the Diaspora intact. The only exception is Yom Kippur; due to the difficulty of fasting for two days, the rabbis did not want to impose the stringency of an additional day.

We, of course, observe Shavuot 50 days after Passover. The physical freedom achieved on Pesach was given to us for the purpose of our accepting the Torah. This is the raison d'etre of the Jewish people. Physical freedom in and of itself is only meaningful if it leads to increased moral and ethical sensitivity and the forming of a nation dedicated to imbuing the physical world with spirituality.

Passover was the time when the Jewish nation was formed. The rabbis tell us that on Shavuot the Jews were fully united as they stood at Mount Sinai to accept the Torah. Unfortunately, this unity has been an elusive quality throughout our history. Let us hope that we can reach the level of the Jews at Mount Sinai who, in the words of the rabbis, were like "one person with one heart."

Opinions

Goldie Hershon's task

A couple of weeks ago I attended the 24th plenary of Canadian Jewish Congress. Founded originally in 1919, Congress suffered a rather rapid decline, which was, however, reversed when, under the leadership of Sam Bronfman and Saul Hayes, it was revived in the late 1930s and became the organization which represented Canadian Jewry.

When I first came to Canada in 1961, I found that Congress could indeed be called the parliament of Canadian Jewry, and I still recall attending my first triennial plenary session in Montreal. Its position was pre-eminent amongst the Jews of the nation, and both federal and provincial governments acknowledged Congress as our legitimate representative.

From my own experience in various positions, including the presidency, Congress had easy access to all government levels. This was true regardless of what position Congress took. We were heard, though our opinions were not necessarily accepted. I think that the pre-eminent position which Congress occupied — legitimately and responsibly — was of great benefit to our people. We had a central organization, federally and in all provinces, and Jews knew to whom to turn when they felt they needed something, when they were attacked individually or as a group. They turned to Congress, and just about anybody who was at all interested in public life was aware of its existence and its potential.

No more. When I returned from Montreal the other day and people asked me where I had been, my answer that I had attended the plenary session of Congress left them blank-eyed and puzzled. "You mean the Congress in the United States?" was one of the responses I received, and while it was understandable (the ambiguity of the term does make this misunderstanding possible), even my further explanation did not elicit much understanding.

Today federations in many communities have taken centre stage and B'nai Brith competes with Congress on various fronts. Regrettably, the end result is that in the process Canadian Jewry has lost its central focus and, therewith, much of its strength.

But the trend is not irreversible, and my recent attendance at the plenary reinforced that conviction.

It was a good convention in many respects, though unfortunately I could not stay for all of it. I was there to observe the excitement — created to a significant degree by the confrontation between Thomas Hecht and Goldie Hershon — but that was the price and not the main course.

One still had a sense that Canadian Jewry was more than a tale of two cities, Montreal and Toronto. Ours is a large country and people attended from its far reaches. At a breakfast on Monday morning I was seated next to a young woman from Prince Edward Island — a community which has 100 to 150 Jews left. She too had her role to play.

Goldie Hershon's victory came primarily on the strength of her long record with Congress and community. A news release says that she promises to rejuvenate the organization, and I hope she will and with her credibility unquestioned, she will find much support. Also, her hope that an understanding can be reached with B'nai Brith for cooperation needs help from many quarters. In some ways it can't really get worse and Goldie has a real task before her. She may not obtain everything she wants, but the very attempt will be progress in itself.

But city federations have become the seeds of today's influence. Political advocacy and the struggle against anti-Semitism, striving to build inter-religious and inter-racial networks and the support of social equity in every community are the primary areas of enterprise that Congress is best fitted for. In addition, it operates meaningfully in most small communities around the country, and here the needs of Jewish education are especially pressing. Congress still has access to governments and it must exploit it to the fullest.

There is also the issue of a Canada-Israel Committee, which during the last few years has faded from public view. In all too many instances internal squabbles have weakened its effectiveness. It sometimes seems to me that when things go well and we Jews find no cause to fight others, we begin fighting amongst ourselves.

We will do well to entrust those areas in which Congress has traditionally shown its strength to Goldie Hershon's leadership. It is in the interest of all of us that the long and honorable record of Congress be revitalized and enlarged.

Outgoing president Irving Abella had a high profile and great personal credibility. Congress now needs to turn to its communities and rebuild its image at the grassroots level. I wish Goldie all the very best and she has my personal support. And if I shall be privileged to attend the next triennial convention of Congress in 1998, I hope that on my return to Toronto more people will know whereof I speak when I relate what happened at the plenary.

A tragicomedy of errors in Israel

The direction the peace process will take is not so much influenced by any single drama as it is by the overall effect of the irresponsible manipulation of the public's mood. Proof for this is the merciless campaign waged by the opponents of the peace process here and in the United States, the fallout of which the Israeli government misunderstood and neglected.

The rise and fall of the decision to expropriate some Arab land in East Jerusalem was a classic tragicomedy of mistakes which left a bitter after-taste. It ended when a badly cornered government managed to survive in parliament only by undoing its decision, under the threat of a non-confidence vote that was to be supported by the most unholy alliance one can think of.

An Arab and communist motion against the expropriation was to be supported by Likud and some religious parties (all most fervent supporters of the expropriation), in the hope of bringing down the government. When the Likud leader then published a number of unacceptable conditions before the vote, the government saved itself by freezing the measure.

Thus a clumsy government that had made an ill-timed decision in the first place was rescued by the ill-advised tactics of an even clumsier opposition. Though the government has won the parliamentary battle, it has no reason to celebrate.

Before Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin had to cut his losses, he persuaded the United States to veto the much watered-down resolutions in the United Nations Security Council against the expropriation. Will that U.S. veto now be recorded by the Arab world as a humiliating irritant or was a price tag attached to it? Will Israel now be asked to return the favor by being more responsive to U.S. ideas on the whole course of negotiations with the Palestinians or was the price of the favor already paid by the freezing of the expropriation plan? And will a stronger U.S. attempt to save the Israel-Syrian discussions from total collapse succeed and if so, will both sides then have the strength to face the moment of truth or will they once more relapse into the already familiar state of indecision?

Now, as the peace process is to get underway once more, no one can predict the behavior of the Arab side. But what about Israel's mood at this juncture? After a short period of euphoria over what seemed to be — and in fact was — a historical breakthrough vis a vis the Palestinians, Israel's perseverance in the further implementation of the interim settlement had slowed down considerably, causing frequent standstills in the wake of Islamic terrorist acts.

Under the combined impact of Islamic savagery and opposition attacks against the government's peace initiative, which according to the rightist opposition was "encouraging Arab terrorism," the government responded defensively and lost public support on many fronts. The manipulation of public opinion by the local opponents of the peace process became a more decisive obstacle to peace with the Arabs than objective security considerations and valid concerns.

But perhaps an even more embarrassing effect of this successful anti-peace campaign, one that must be openly recognized, is that "peace" has become a dirty word in many sectors here — so dirty in fact, that even some of its promoters were reluctant to counter the trend as decisively as they should and could. And Israel's most implacable enemies of all sorts must be comfortable seeing the very notion of peace, which they fear and abhor, so effectively discredited by their most improbable allies here, Israel's rightist opposition.

What should we conclude? That Rabin's government is in deep trouble and may seek new alliances that could prolong its life but paralyze it. It may also undergo a serious reshuffling of manpower and ideas and recover from the lethargy but still lose one of the predictable confidence tests, even before a rightist coalition attempts to win the next elections. In that case, Likud and its allies may be given the chance to test their own ideas on how to bring peace to Israel and how to handle the nation's issues better than Labor.

In the meantime, both parties are busy treating their own internal conflicts while preparing their respective primaries. In such times, political leaders everywhere are usually more concerned with their political future than with the national issues of the present.

A holiday for vegetarians

At an age when I didn't know about the 613 mitzvot (I couldn't even comprehend the number 613), I already observed one mitzvah — the seudat mitzvah — the festive meal. On yom tov after davening Ma'ariv the extended family would gather at my grandparents' home to sit down to a gluttonous consumption of gefilte fish, chopped liver, roast chicken and brisket accompanied by mashed potatoes generously laced with shmaltz.

The exception was Shavuot, when the menu consisted of beet borscht, blintzes and salads prepared from such vegetables as could be stored in the root cellar, for fresh greens at this time of the year were unheard of in Winnipeg. The custom of not serving meat stems, among other explanations, from Shavuot as a festival marking a new agricultural season.

Now, two generations later this tradition continues, with the gathering place in our home. Of all the yamin tovim, my brother-in-law favors Shavuot. After 25 years in California, the black-haired salami addict returned as a grey-haired vegetarian. The grey hair is not of his own volition, but the vegetarianism is definitely by choice.

My brother-in-law teaches philosophy; so his vegetarianism is rooted in many dialectic theories, which he suggests apply universally to all humans. But he was of no help when I asked how Inuit could subscribe to such a lifestyle and avail themselves of the right food.

There are two types of vegetarians. The vegetarian-vegetarian and the non-vegetarian-vegetarian. The first eats nothing but plant material while the second avoids meat, but indulges in dairy products, fish and eggs. Both make substantive claims for their lifestyles, believing that if we would eat properly, and live in harmony with nature, we would be far healthier.

On the other hand, there is the view of George Bernard Shaw who wrote: "Vegetarians claim to be immune from most diseases but they have been known to die from time to time — there are millions of vegetarians in the world but only one George Bernard Shaw. You do not obtain eminence so cheaply as by eating macaroni instead of mutton chops."

Without meat we wouldn't need a shochet — there goes another job opportunity for a Jewish boy (why not a Jewish girl?). Without meat we wouldn't raise herds of cattle and wouldn't need cowboys. What would Clint Eastwood and half of Hollywood do?

Anther theme of Shavuot is revelation. Moses, in Leviticus and Deuteronomy, sets out dietary laws and practices. For centuries, rabbis have codified regulations concerning food. The ritual became so detailed that the rabbis' expertise lay in their mastery of the rules: what food is prescribed, permitted and prepared.

One of my twin 8-year-old granddaughters is a vegetarian. Her exegesis is to be found in Genesis 1:29 — "And God said: Behold I have given you every herb bearing seed upon the earth, and all trees that have in themselves seed of their own kind, to be your meat." Since she hasn't read Genesis, she observes her seudat mitzvah as I did mine when I was her age — by revelation.

The battle for Jerusalem

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

When Israeli and Palestinian negotiators were hammering out the Oslo accord in 1993, they deliberately sidestepped one of the most contentious issues — the status of Jerusalem.

They agreed that this pivotal question should be temporarily shelved until more immediate matters, such as the establishment of a Palestinian authority in the Gaza Strip and the West Bank town of Jericho, could be resolved.

Under the Declaration of Principles (DoP), the issue is scheduled to be addressed in May 1996 and, presumably, settled within three years.

Given the complexities of the Arab-Israeli dispute, it seemed reasonable to put off a discussion of Jerusalem. But of late, Jerusalem has been thrust into the forefront, and the opening salvos in the battle for Jerusalem have been fired by Israel, the Palestinian National Authority (PNA) and the United States.

•Israel has confiscated land in and around Jerusalem in the past number of years and announced plans to build thousands of housing units there.

•The PNA has taken concrete steps to claim East Jerusalem (annexed by Israel in the wake of the 1967 Six Day War) as the capital of a future Palestinian state.

•American politicians, notably those with presidential ambitions, have called upon the Clinton administration to move the U.S. Embassy in Israel from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem.

The brouhaha has placed Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin and President Bill Clinton in an awkward position, divided the Israeli cabinet and enraged the Arabs. The prospects are that the controversy will fester like an open sore, as a reminder of the deep-seated passions and political opportunism that Jerusalem ignites in Israel, the Arab world and the United States.

Jerusalem is holy to three monotheistic faiths — Judaism, Islam and Christianity. Successively conquered by the Byzantines, Persians, Arabs, Crusaders, Ottoman Turks and British, it is doubtless the most contested city in history.

For Christians, Jerusalem is the reputed site of the Last Supper and the crucifixion of Jesus. For Muslims, Jerusalem is one of the revered cities of Islam. For Jews, Jerusalem is not just Israel's capital, from David's time on, but the spiritual repository of Judaism, and, as historian Martin Gilbert writes, "the fulfilment of unbroken historical longing."

The Jewish claim to Jerusalem is indeed strong. It was the capital of the first Jewish kingdom some 3,000 years ago. It was reclaimed by the Jews after their Babylonian exile. By the mid-19th century, Jews were the largest religious community in Jerusalem, which had been neglected by the Ottomans. By 1914, the Jewish population was 45,000 out of 65,000. On the eve of the War of Independence, 100,000 Jews and 65,000 Arabs resided in the city.

By the terms of the United Nations' 1947 Palestine partition plan, Jerusalem was to be an international enclave administered by the UN. But this was not to be. During the 1948-49 war, the Arab Legion of Jordan captured the eastern half of Jerusalem, driving out its Jewish inhabitants and sacking synagogues. After hostilities ceased, Jordan banned Jewish visitors from praying at the Western Wall.

Israel held on to the western portion of Jerusalem, declaring it its capital. For almost three decades, greater Jerusalem was physically divided. But in June 1967, Israeli paratroopers swept into East Jerusalem, and Israel officially annexed it. In July 1980, the Knesset, to the chorus of world-wide condemnation, passed legislation confirming Jerusalem's status as Israel's "eternal and undivided" capital.

For the past 27 years, city planning in Jerusalem has been propelled by political considerations. Israel's strategy, vehemently opposed by the Palestinians, has turned and still turns on creating unalterable facts on the ground. Israel has built a ring of Jewish neighborhoods — Ramot, Nevei Ya'akov, French Hill, Gilo, to cite but a few — around the city, while drastically limiting Arab construction.

As a result of the building boom, the Jewish population has doubled to 420,000, of whom 150,000 live across the old Green Line. By contrast, 155,000 Palestinians inhabit Jerusalem.

In conformity with its policy that Jerusalem's present status is non-negotiable, the Israeli government has decided to build more than 30,000 apartments in and near the city over the next five years. Recently, Israel said it would expropriate 53 hectares of mostly Arab land in Beit Hanina and Beit Safafa, which lie close to Jerusalem. But last week, in response to various pressures, Israel suspended the expropriations.

Nevertheless, Jerusalem's status is far from resolved. As Israel's housing minister, Benjamin Ben-Eliezer — an ardent advocate of consolidating Israel's hold over Jerusalem and environs — put it recently: "The battle for Jerusalem has begun."

But the government's policy has sown dissension within Rabin's cabinet. For example: Foreign Minister Shimon Peres, while reiterating Israel's claim to Jerusalem, has acknowledged that Israel is obliged to defer discussions on Jerusalem's fate until final status talks get under way next year.

Peres' soothing words, however, have hardly mollified the Palestinians. Last month, with the help of Arab delegates, they brought the issue before the United Nations Security Council. The United States vetoed the resolution.

The Oslo accord does not specifically forbid land confiscation and expansion of settlements. Yet it commits Israel and the Palestinians not to engage in actions that might prejudice final status negotiations over Jerusalem.

If Israel has violated the spirit of Oslo, so has the PNA.

According to Peace Watch — which monitors compliance of the DoP and the May 1994 Cairo agreement — the PNA is illegally operating nine institutions in East Jerusalem which should be located in the Gaza Strip and Jericho. These run the gamut from the Ministry of Religious Affairs to Orient House, the Palestinians' shadow city council and the PLO's de facto headquarters in Jerusalem.

Rabin has warned the PNA that he intends to remove Palestinian institutions linked to self-rule. So far, he has not made good on his threat. But he has ordered the police to monitor events and movements at Orient House and strongly discouraged foreign dignitaries from visiting.

Sometimes, the advice is resented. Two weeks ago, Sweden's deputy foreign minister cut short her visit to Israel when it was suggested she avoid Orient House.

Partisan politics in the United States has only exacerbated the ill feelings over Jerusalem.

In March, 93 out of 100 senators called on the government to move the U.S. Embassy in Israel to Jerusalem no later than May 1999, when Israel and the PLO are scheduled to finish final status talks. The resolution was sponsored by two Republican senators from New York, Daniel Moynihan and Alfonse D'Amato. Their motion, in part, was intended to squelch a more radical resolution presented by John Kyl (Arizona) to transfer the embassy by October of this year.

Shortly afterward, the Republican candidates for president — Bob Dole, Phil Gramm, Arlen Specter and Pete Wilson — voiced support of the Moynihan-D'Amato resolution. So did Newt Gingrich, the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Their joint resolution has put Rabin and Clinton in a bind. Though both theoretically favor it, they fear that it may harm the already battered peace process and damage Washington's credibility in the eyes of the Arabs.

With this in mind, the Clinton administration has launched a campaign to keep the issue on the back burner. Martin Indyk, the U.S. ambassador to Israel — the first Jew to serve in that post — has gone so far as to say that if the United States acts on the resolution now, the peace process would be compromised.

The congressional fracas, a replay of a 1984 struggle which the Reagan administration crushed in a bruising fight, highlights the shifting nature of U.S. policy vis-a-vis Jerusalem.

Until 1967, Washington supported the internationalization of Jerusalem. Since then, the United States has expressed support for the principle of a unified Jerusalem, while insisting that its "final status should be decided through negotiations."

THE BATTLE FOR JERUSALEM HAS MOVED TO THE U.S. CONGRESS
AND IT HAS PROVEN TWO IMPORTANT FACTS!
FIRST, THAT NOT EVERY CHRISTIAN IS AN ANTI-SEMITE.
AND SECOND
THAT NOT EVERY JEW IS OUR FRIEND.
MOVING THE U.S. EMBASSY TO JERUSALEM IS NOW ANTI-ISRAEL.
AND DONATING MONEY TO THE PALESTINIAN AUTHORITY IS PRO-ISRAELI?!
YES.
A NEW ISRAELI PLAN TO CONFUSE THE ENEMY??
NO.
A NEW ISRAELI PLAN TO CONFUSE EVERYBODY!

Mideast Analysis
By Sheldon Kirshner

Syrian talks

Nearly four years have passed since Israel and Syria entered into bilateral peace talks, yet progress has been agonizingly slow. In the meantime, Israel has signed historic accords with the PLO and Jordan.

The negotiations with Syria have been arduous and frustrating because of the complexity of the issues and the level of mistrust.

Who will gain final ownership of the Golan Heights and under what conditions? What will become of Israel's settlements and water resources there following an Israeli withdrawal? How will normalization proceed?

Mutual bitterness and suspicion exacerbate the situation. Syria — which has fought four wars and numerous skirmishes with Israel — regards its Zionist foe as an illegitimate implant in the region and an expansionist state whose aggression must be curbed. Israel views Syria as a recalcitrant, ruthless foe, a viscerally anti-Zionist champion of Arab radicalism, and a spoiler who meddles in the affairs of the Palestinians and its contiguous Arab neighbors (notably Lebanon).

Both sides, however, recognize that circumstances have changed and that an opportunity is now at hand to put the past behind and move toward rapprochement.

Nevertheless, after four years of on-again-off-again talks and the vigorous intervention of the United States, Israel and Syria remain disappointingly far apart on substantive matters. Last month, Syria's foreign minister met with President Bill Clinton and Secretary of State Warren Christopher in Washington in an effort to break the impasse, but the gap was barely narrowed.

The negotiations turn on four inter-related topics — the depth of Israel's pullback from the Golan, the timetable for withdrawal, security arrangements and normalization.

Syria will not settle for anything less than a full evacuation of Israeli forces, preferably back to the June 4, 1967 border, as opposed to the 1949 armistice lines. Israel has not publicly spelled out its terms, but seems reconciled to giving up much, if not all, of the Golan.

Originally, Israel offered a phased withdrawal over five to eight years. Syria has whittled this down to about four years, but hopes to reclaim the Golan after 18 months.

Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin has described security arrangements as the key to the entire exercise. They include border adjustments, demilitarized zones, early warning stations, size and deployment of armies and international supervision of the agreement. Syria had pressed for balanced and reciprocal arrangements, but the Syrians dropped that demand last week in the face of Israel's insistence that symmetrical arrangements were unacceptable.

Finally, Israel is holding out for full diplomatic relations after its initial withdrawal. Syria offers far less.

Time is of essence. Rabin believes that he must hammer out a deal before the 1996 Israeli elections. The Syrians appear to be in no hurry. Clearly, Syria is a hard nut to crack.

By RABBI PERETZ WEIZMAN

This shabbat, we start the fourth book of the five books of Moses, the book of Bamidbar, also known as Numbers. This name is given because the book begins with the numbering of the Israelites. It deals with statistics and counting.

Rashi quoting the midrash in Parshat Pinchas gives the following explanation why counting was necessary. A parable is told of a wolf attacking a herd of sheep and devouring many. The shepherd then counts the remnants of his flock. Rashi continues that something similar happened to the Jewish people. After a plague, G-d counted them to know how many were left. "Leida minyan hanotarim."

(It is noteworthy, that this explanation is contrary to the belief that the counting caused the plague. According to this midrash, the plague caused the counting.)

Then the question we should ask is: If the census is to know how many are left, who has to know? Is it G-d that needs to know and therefore we humans must provide him with the information? Without our census He will not know who is left? He who is omniscient, who is "Zan mikarnei reeim vead beitzei kinim" (Brachot) needs our help to give Him the exact number of his creatures? Are we G-d's bookkeepers and statisticians?

The answer is: G-d knows each and every one of his creatures without our assistance. It is WE, who have to know how many are left. The census is for us.

Being a Holocaust survivor, I understand the profound lesson of this midrash. We have to know who is left. We, or anyone, G-d forbid, who suffered losses should not see only what he or she has lost. At this moment of enormous grief, unbearable sorrow and pain, we should not focus our thoughts on only the dear and beloved ones we have lost. It is imperative to be aware also of those who survived.

The lesson the Torah relates is that however great the losses may be, however grieved our mind, soul, and heart may feel, we have to go on with life.

G-d gave us two eyes to balance our outlook on life, to see the decimation and emptiness and at the same time not to overlook the potentials and the life that is still with us. G-d's reply to Moses "Dabeir el Bnei Israel veyisou" (Exodus 14:13). "Speak unto the children of Israel, that they go forward" must vibrate in our ears.

We must go on with life, in spite of how unbearable it may be. Even when we fall hard on the ground we have to pick ourselves up, to rise again and to start again.

Resurrection is G-d's promise. Revival and renewal is what we Jews practise. Life after death is not only a principle of our faith, it is more than that; it is a vital imperative. It is an obligation in Jewish life and history. Construction from destruction is our mission. The establishment of the state of Israel after the Holocaust is a living affirmation of this truth.

I was taken away from my beloved family 51 years ago never to see them again. The date was March 4, 1944. This date of March 4 gave me providentially the message of my life. The message is March Forth. However enormous the losses are, go on living. If not for your sake, then live for the sake of those who did not survive. Live for them! We must live their legacy.

There is a need and even more so a responsibility to affirm life. King David's outcry "Lo amut kee echye"("I will not die but live") is the motto of our people. King David is the personification of Jewish eternity. Messiah who is traditionally believed to be a descendant of King David taught us to cling to life. Our love for life, our l'chayim wish to life will secure us eternity.

Bais Yaakov honors founders

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Six founding board members of Bais Yaakov Elementary School were honored at the school's 26th annual dinner, held last month at Beth Avraham Yoseph Congregation in Thornhill.

Nearly 600 people attended.

Avrohom Arnold, Berel Fuerst, Aaron Zvi Gestetner, the Reichmann family, the late Israel Simon and Dr. Philip Weitz were praised by award presenter David Hofstedter for "establishing a school devoted to Torah principles, which, despite explosive growth, recession, and deficits, hasn't deviated from its goals."

The Orthodox girls' school is important because "the Jewish home is a function of the women who run it," said emcee Feival Weinles. "Only with dynamic women can we have a dynamic community."

Rabbi David and Batsheva Schochet, leaders of the Toronto Lubavitch community, received the "grandparents of the year" award.

Son-in-law Emmanuel Dienna praised the couple for understanding that "the obligation of grandparents is to teach [their grandchildren] but also to hear their problems, to play, and to listen."

Keynote speaker Rabbi Joshua Fishman, national director of Torah Umesorah, the National Society for Hebrew Day Schools, praised the school foudners.

A leading pianist

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Eighteen-year-old pianist Tanya Roitman recently performed with several illustrious members of the Manitoba professional music world.

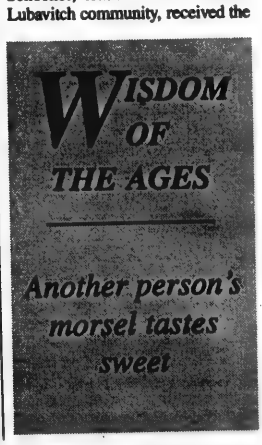
With Winnipeg Symphony Orchestra conductor Bramwell Tovey, soprano Tracy Dahl, baritone Hugh Russell, violinist Benjamin Bowman and French horn player Susan Helfter, Roitman took part in a gala fundraising concert for Associated Manitoba Arts Festival Inc.

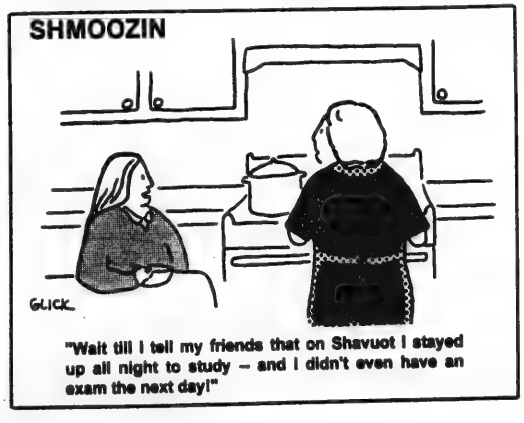
The young pianist began lessons in her native Kiev when she was six and began performing the following year.

Four years ago, the family moved to Winnipeg, where the former Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate student has performed at the Sharon Home for Winnipeg's Jewish seniors and at synagogues. She has also competed at the Manitoba Music festival and in competitions around the province.

While in Winnipeg, she has been involved in BBYO and last spring, she went on The March of the Living.

This spring, Roitman is graduating from the University of Winnipeg Collegiate.





"Wait till I tell my friends that on Shavuot I stayed up all night to study -- and I didn't even have an exam the next day!"

Responding to survivors

By MYRA GIBEROVITCH

Holocaust survivors have taught us that the human condition can be remarkably versatile and resilient. Having experienced the depths of depravity of mankind, many survived with dignity to rebuild their lives.

Most Holocaust survivors today are over the age of 65. For many, their senior years are a period of growth and satisfaction evidenced in a variety of ways. In spite of deep psychological wounds, many survivors have succeeded in achieving psychological well-being.

GUEST VOICES

Survivors have enriched the Montreal Jewish community in the areas of Yiddish culture, Jewish education, religious institutions and through their involvement in a host of communal organizations. Survivors are partially responsible for Canada's anti-hate legislation. In the 1960s, the Association of Survivors of Nazi Oppression spearheaded a campaign against a resurgence of neo-Nazism in Quebec, which culminated in the incorporation of anti-hate legislation into the Criminal Code in 1970.

The literature cautions us to pay particular attention to the aging process of Holocaust survivors. Life event stresses such as retirement, loss of autonomy, illness, the death of a spouse or adult child, lack of financial security, intensive caregiving situation and relocation to a new environment may activate feelings of loss, dependency and vulnerability related to past experience.

Survivors respond to their loss of independence in different ways. For some, a decline in physical health may restrict them and lead to disengagement from activities. Social isolation may lead to loneliness, depression, a focus on past horrific experiences and preoccupation with physical ailments.

Retired individuals, especially men who kept busy with hard work, may be vulnerable to the onslaught of repressed memories, disturbed sleep and nightmares.

An all-important issue pertaining to social support has been the demise of the activities of landsmanshaftn (organizations of people who originated from the same European geographic area). With the loss of this resource, many are experiencing loneliness and isolation, which often lead to depression. The quality of life of the isolated survivor can often be improved through support services and activities which provide social, physical and mental stimulation.

For other survivors though, a decline in health is viewed as a challenge to overcome. Some have a tenacious survival instinct manifested by a determination to recover when severely ill. Others manage to maintain control over their environments in spite of physical and mental health difficulties. Still others exhibit a general acceptance of their present situation, no matter how difficult that may be.

With some survivors, sickness is associated with death. In the camps, the weak and infirm were sent to their deaths.

Attitudes to doctors may vacillate between reverence and mistrust. In the death camps, doctors selected those who would live or die and conducted medical experiments. Doctors appointments, tests, hospitalization and surgery may induce anxiety, depression and Holocaust-related nightmares.

In recent years, more and more survivors have begun to open up about their experiences. A number of factors have contributed to this. First, the senior years in general are a time of reflection and re-examination of one's life and integration of past experiences. These years are also a time of resolution of emotional conflict and an attempt to find some peace of mind. Furthermore, a natural cognitive response of aging is remembering distant rather than recent events. Other factors are as follows: In the past decade, the "conspiracy of silence" about the Holocaust has dissipated; there is an urgency to bear witness prompted by the Holocaust denial movement; there is a need to talk in response to new threats such as anti-Semitic incidents. Survivors are often prompted to recount experiences in response to their adult children's questions about their roots and heritage. Movies, reports of Nazi war criminal trials, commemorative events and recent genocides in Rwanda and the former Yugoslavia often trigger repressed memories.

Many survivors, though, are reticent to talk about their experiences. Their silence must be respected. Repression of their memories has been an effective coping mechanism.

Gerontological studies have linked emotional well-being with a sense of meaning and purpose in life. Individuals find meaning in different ways. The survivor of war-related traumatic life events may find meaning in survival. Many survivors have lived with the "holy mission" of remembering and memorializing their dead family members, friends and extinguished communities. Bearing witness has infused meaning into survival.

In recent years, communities around the world have instituted programs to meet the unique needs of aging Holocaust survivors. A 1994 demographic study conducted by McGill University professors Jim Torczyner and Shari Brotman, in conjunction with FEDERATION CJA and Statistics Canada, identified that 28.2 per cent of Montreal Jewish seniors are Holocaust survivors. This study concludes that "responding sensitively to the needs of aging Holocaust survivors must help shape the community's agenda." Initiating programs and services to meet survivors' unique needs will ensure that the last stage of heir lives is as comfortable as possible.

Developing a Jewish identity

TORONTO — Some teenagers may reject their Jewishness "to try on other identities to be different," but those who have been brought up in a home where Judaism is practised will eventually come back to it, said a specialist in adolescent medicine.

Dr. Diane Sacks was the guest speaker recently at the 12th annual Rosalynd Smith Memorial Lecture at the Adath Israel Synagogue.

A pediatrician with 24 years' experience working with teenagers — she established the teen clinic at North York General Hospital in 1991 — Sacks shared her insights and her experiences, examining issues of self-esteem, decision-making, Jewish identity and role modelling.

Becoming independent and separating from the family is one of the tasks teenagers need to accomplish, as they make the transition to adulthood. Searching for one's identity is part of this process, she said.

A child's Jewish identity must be developed before adolescence, because teenagers are less likely to be interested in their Jewish identities and they may experiment with others as they try to separate from their families, Sacks said.

"Our kids, in searching for who they are, need a foundation [in Judaism] ... They may have to be different ... But they'll know where to come back to."

Sacks also advised parents of teenagers to recognize their children's pull toward independence and learn to loosen the reins. "A person much wiser than me told me, 'The art of parenting is the art of letting go,' " she said.

To facilitate the process, parents need to give their teenagers more latitude in making decisions by negotiating with them, Sacks said. "You must respect their time and needs. Let them know they're becoming people on their own."

But she cautioned that negotiations can't always have the same winner and loser or the teen won't negotiate.

Sacks stressed the importance of parents spending time with teens, especially around the dinner table — families need to sit down to a meal together at least three times a week.

Some families don't eat any meals together because their children are so over-programmed they're skipping meals or eating in the car between activities, she said.

Blacks' Jerusalem tribute raises $300,000 for library

By AMY SATTIN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Journalist Barbara Amiel and her husband, Conrad Black, were honored here last week for their support of Jerusalem.

Amiel, a London-based newspaper columnist, and Black, owner of the Jerusalem Post and chairman of Hollinger Inc., were feted by 750 people at a dinner organized by the Jerusalem Foundation, the non-sectarian organization started by former Jerusalem mayor Teddy Kollek to beautify the city.

The $300,000 raised from the $275 a plate dinner will be used to buy books for a reading room in the Jerusalem Central Library.

Amiel, a secular Jew who married Black in 1992, good-naturedly admitted that "it took my marriage to a large Canadian gentile to get me on this platform." She told The CJN she was embarrassed by the honor, "but I'm glad my husband cares about Jerusalem."

Black poked fun at himself as well, adding to the laughter generated by tribute speakers Edward Greenspan and John Fraser.

After doing a credible imitation of Henry Kissinger, a former Hollinger director, Black went on to thank his parents for instilling in him "a tolerance for almost everything except intolerance."

Barbara Amiel and Conrad Black arriving at the Jerusalem Foundation dinner in their honor last Thursday.

Kollek, 85, was on hand to pay tribute to the couple and to explain that the Jerusalem Foundation aims "to bring the earthly Jerusalem as close to the heavenly Jerusalem as we can," through educational, social and cultural programs.

Dinner guests were drawn from the city's business and media elite, and included investment managers Ira Gluskin and Gerald Sheff, members of the Tory and Eaton families, and Paul Godfrey of the Toronto Sun. Former Archbishop of Toronto Emmet Cardinal Carter was seated at the head table.

Windsor JNF dinner to honor survivors

MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

WINDSOR — Holocaust survivors will be the honorees at this year's Windsor Jewish National Fund (JNF) Tribute Dinner on June 15 at 6:15 p.m. at the Caboto Club.

In commemoration of the 50th anniversary of the end of World War II and the liberation of the concentration camps of Europe, the board of the Windsor JNF decided to mark the event "by recognizing the contribution of the survivors to our community," announced Windsor JNF president Jerry Goldberg.

Ed Asner

"We believe that commemorating this important event will have a significant educational impact on the entire Jewish community, as well as on the community at large," the announcement said.

Keynote speaker will be actor Ed Asner, whose relatives, Abraham and Libby Asner, are among the 62 survivors being honored.

Best known for his portrayal of journalist Lou Grant on The Mary Tyler Moore Show and Lou Grant, Asner also narrated For the Living, Story of the U.S. Holocaust Museum, which chronicles the building of the Holocaust museum in Washington and was shown on public television.

Active on behalf of many humanitarian and political causes, Asner is currently a member of the advisory board of Israel Civil Rights and Peace.

Proceeds from the dinner will go towards JNF development programs in the Negev.

Dinner co-chairs will be Lillian and Adam Friedland and Olga and Sam Honig.

Tight race in Willowdale

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

Les Scheininger

Charles Harnick

Julia McCrea

NORTH YORK — Two high profile Jewish candidates, Progressive Conservative incumbent Charles Harnick and Liberal contender Les Scheininger, both lawyers, could make it a tight race in the riding of Willowdale.

But the NDP's hopeful, teacher Julia McCrea, who faced off against North York Mayor Mel Lastman in the 1994 municipal election, concedes nothing, noting that the NDP earned a healthy vote in the last provincial poll.

Others on the ballot include the Green Party's Laura Weinberg and Independent Frank Zeppieri.

The riding, which encompasses the heart of North York, is home to a significant seniors population, but young business people and families are moving in because of the amenities and direct transit to downtown Toronto.

According to the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, the potential Jewish vote was 13 per cent of the population in 1991, and has probably risen to 15 per cent. There are several synagogues and at least two day schools.

Harnick, the lone Jewish MPP on the Tory benches, says voters are talking about jobs, taxes and deficits.

"They see the wealth leaving the province and they're concerned about the future for their children and grandchildren," he declared.

The New Democrats and Liberals before them spent "wildly," he charges, maintaining that Ontario "does not have a revenue problem, it has a spending problem."

Leader Mike Harris' proposed tax cuts would balance the budget without harming health care, policing and education, he says.

Scheininger, a former national president of Canadian Jewish Congress, sees an overriding concern with the economy.

He focuses on leader Lyn McLeod's "red book" plan, which would introduce balanced budget legislation within 30 days of taking office, a youth opportunities strategy within 90 days and a balanced budget within four years.

McCrea observes that McLeod's time-staggered plans "sound like an RRSP." She zeroes in on the need to preserve universal health care and affordable housing for those on fixed incomes.

Premier Bob's Rae's government she states, is working to access social services through an easy, one-stop, central "shopping centre."

All three candidates decry the upsurge in racist and hate activity.

Scheininger says he has dealt with the issue with four successive premiers and several attorneys general, asking for "proper and thorough investigation leading to prosecution where appropriate."

Harnick says he is sometimes advised not to give Holocaust denier Ernst Zundel a platform, but "I can't just let it lie. I'm not prepared to ignore it."

The NDP, says McCrea, has required school boards to institute anti-racism policies.

"Every board must come up with an initiative," she says.

Sense of community a key issue for McLeod

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Whether it's the Jewish or any other ethnic group, for Ontario Liberal leader Lyn McLeod, a key issue in this election is community.

"We address five underlying themes in setting out our plan, and one of them is a sense of community. I believe very strongly that government needs to be more responsive to people in communities. And that should be true whether it's community economic development or the way in which we provide health care services," McLeod told The CJN in a recent wide-ranging interview aboard her campaign bus.

"I know the Jewish community has been very strong in providing housing and long-term care services," she noted. "And my belief, and that of the Liberal Party, is to build on that sense of community and provide support for it."

McLeod was arguably the first leader out of the blocks to court the Jewish vote in the Metro Toronto area. (She also visited Israel last fall, where she met with MKs and Canadian students.)

Her team includes three Jewish former cabinet ministers — Monte Kwinter, Steve Offer and Elinor Caplan — while former Canadian Jewish Congress national president Les Scheininger is a candidate in Willowdale.

McLeod, who won the leadership in 1992 in a close race, is rarely without her red book, The Ontario Liberal Plan, a meaty, 82 pages of bar graphs and timetables. In some jurisdictions, it might be regarded as a conservative manifesto, but in Ontario it's more of a reaction against the governing NDP. Some of its highlights:

- a balanced budget within four years and introduction of balanced budget legislation;
- a spending cut of $4 billion and a tax cut of five per cent;
- cutting by half, the cost of dealing with government regulations;
- increased funds for those starting a small business;
- and an important concern for some Jewish seniors: restoring

Lyn McLeod

OHIP's $400-a-day emergency out-of-country coverage, cut back to $100 a day by the NDP.

The leader is of two minds when it comes to public funding for Jewish and other private schools. Through five years in power, many individual Liberals favored the idea, but the party remained opposed. McLeod says that from a "personal perspective," one direction set out in the 1986 Shapiro Report, which recommended funding for alternative schools within a public school system umbrella, "was one which I could subscribe to."

But "the limitations on extending funding, in the name of openness and frankness, are obviously financial." And nowhere in the red book's eight pages on education is funding for private schools discussed.

Asked directly whether she favors funding, McLeod said: "I'm prepared to review proposals which would look at [things like] funding consortiums [or] ways in which the publicly funded system can work in cooperation with independent schools.

"There aren't specific concerns in front of us yet, and obviously I would have to be concerned about [their] financial implications. But if a proposal is consistent with the overall philosophical direction of the Shapiro Report, I'd certainly be prepared to consider it."

McLeod says the Grits are the only party to spell out in their plan what they would do about hate crimes:

- designate special Crown attorneys, from within current staff, to prosecute or oversee the prosecution of all crimes in which hate is a factor;
- prohibit the Crown from plea bargaining hate crimes, and instruct it to seek maximum penalties;
- designate special OPP officers to help the public and police in small communities in reporting and investigating hate crimes and hate literature;
- bring together affected parties to develop strategy on anti-racism programs (likely a continuation of the NDP's Cabinet Roundtable on Anti-Racism);
- and review government spending to ensure public education becomes the priority in anti-racism and race related grants and programs.

Asked whether Scheininger is headed to cabinet if he wins, McLeod smiles. "He's a tremendous candidate," she allows. "Very, very strong ..."

Liberals show confidence in Hamilton ridings

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — Ontario Liberals are confident that their six candidates in the Hamilton region represent the party's best effort in 25 years.

Courting voters for the June 8 provincial election are Chris Ward in Wentworth North and Shirley Collins in Wentworth East. Both are former Liberal cabinet members.

But the NDP has three cabinet ministers from Hamilton: Solicitor General David Christopherson, Housing Minister Richard Allen and Government House Leader Brian Charlton.

In Hamilton Centre, lawyer Filomena Tassi stands a good chance of ousting Christopherson, according to Milt Lewis, a former president of the Ontario Liberal Party.

Lewis says that in Hamilton West, Helen Wilson may give Allen, who has held the seat since 1981, a stiff challenge.

In Hamilton Mountain, where the controversial Red Hill Expressway is a major issue, Charlton faces strong opposition from two first-time candidates: Liberal Marie Buontragianni and Tory Trevor Petit.

Another strong Liberal candidate is Dominic Agostino, well-known local politician and councillor, in the riding of Hamilton East. He faces the NDP's Andrew Mackenzie, son of former labor minister Bob Mackenzie, who is stepping down after 20 years at Queen's Park.

Tory hopefuls are mostly first-timers and relatively unknown. However, Conservatives are enthusiastic about Crown attorney Toni Skarica, who is making an impact in Wentworth North.

"People are only now beginning to take an interest in the election," says Judy Mintz, the PC party's first vice-president, adding that door-to-door response has been "excellent."

In Wentworth East, former CHCH-TV journalist Ed Doyle is another high-profile PC candidate, while in Hamilton West, Tory Lillian Ross seems strong.

Another strong candidate is Tory Cam Jackson, who defied the 1990 NDP tide and retained his Burlington South riding with a substantial margin.

At Christopherson's election headquarters, campaign manager Terry Whitehead concedes that "a lot of people are disgruntled" with the NDP. But there's a great deal of "support and respect" for Christopherson.

Whitehead predicts a tight race between Mackenzie and Agostino, and predicts that of all local NDP candidates, Don Abel in Wentworth North faces the toughest fight.

Oakwood's Joe Flexer runs as an independent

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — "Organize, mobilize and fight — together we can change the world!" reads the campaign literature distributed by Oakwood independent candidate Joe Flexer.

Running on a five-pronged campaign, Flexer, 62, is calling for repeal of the New Democrats' social contract (Bill 48). He is also for publicly-owned auto insurance; against cuts to social services; against racism, sexism and homophobia; and "against police repression; for civilian control of the police."

A longtime union activist, Flexer is pushing for repeal of Bill 48, calling it "an abridgment of the democratic right of workers for free collective bargaining."

He said his campaign "believes that the deficit is artificially manufactured" and is unconnected to payouts for social services.

Instead, it was created by a combination of high interest rates and unfair taxation. Lowering rates and implementing fair taxation would halt a "transfer of wealth to the banks," he said.

If elected, Flexer pledged to provide a voice for "mass movements," including labor, social action groups, gay and lesbian organizations, women's movements and poor people.

A native of New York City, Flexer moved to Israel in 1951, where he served in the army and resided for 15 years. He was active in the Habonim movement and lived on kibbutz Urim, near Beersheba.

Flexer said he favors a two-state solution to the Israel-Palestinian conflict, with Jerusalem either being internationalized or divided. He opposes the annexation of East Jerusalem to Israel.

Mike Harris promises crackdown on hate crimes

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — With his neat appearance and measured delivery, Mike Harris might have a hard time being taken for a revolutionary.

But Ontario's Tory leader never tires, it seems, of trumpeting his Common Sense Revolution — nothing short of a complete overhaul of the province's taxation, spending, bureaucracy, education and welfare systems and many of its services.

A one-time golf pro, ski resort owner and school trustee, Harris has come a long way since 1990, when he took over what was once Ontario's omnipotent Big Blue Machine, now the third party. But like Liberal leader Lyn McLeod (the similaries end here), he zeroes in on Premier Bob Rae like a hawk, charging that Ontarians have had it with skyrocketing deficits, and pine for some restraint.

Harris is fond of presenting his plan unvarnished — the straight goods, he calls it — all contained in a decidedly no-frills, 22-page newsprint booklet, quite unlike McLeod's glitzy red book. In it, Harris spells out his common sense vision, which calls for:

- cutting provincial income taxes by 30 per cent over three years, with half of that in the first year, to give Ontarians the lowest tax rates in Canada;
- cutting "non-priority" government spending by 20 per cent over three years without touching health care, law enforcement or classroom funding;
- balancing the budget and creating 725,000 new jobs over three years, as a result of the above two measures;
- instituting mandatory work- and "learnfare";
- and doing away with such NDP mainstays as job equity, payroll health taxes for small business and other regulatory "burdens."

In an interview with The CJN last week, Harris shied away from comparisons to the federal Reform Party and dismissed some claims that his platform is more right-leaning than any in recent memory.

"I don't think it's right-wing, left-wing anymore," he said. "I don't think those words apply too much to policies. [The platform] is not as right-wing as taking away employees' bargaining rights, as Bob Rae did. But if it means less government, less taxes, real welfare reform, and more encouragement for the private sector, then it is certainly to the right of the Liberals and the NDP. It is more right-wing than [any platform] in the last 10 years, but we haven't been in government the last 10 years.

"Our tax cuts won't take tax rates back to the Bill Davis days; they'll still be higher. We won't take spending back to those days. But it is a major correction of the massive shift to the left of the Liberals and NDP."

And that platform has met with an "overwhelmingly positive" response from ethnic communities, Harris adds.

Over the years, Harris has been visible on the Jewish scene, showing up for rallies and speaking out on the issues. On the community's most pressing concern — government funding for day schools — he adopted a wait-and-see position five years ago, arguing, with some sympathy, that the money for private and independent education just wasn't there.

Now the matter is before Canada's Supreme Court and Harris says his party is "prepared to discuss the various systems. We're very concerned with the system as it is today. You can't have any meaningful review of funding in education without looking at funding for Jewish and denominational schools. It's been before us too long."

Asked specifically how the Tories would deal with the political hot potato, Harris said his party is "supportive" of finding ways in which Jewish day schools can affiliate with exisiting public boards, and he discounted out of hand the concept of a voucher system.

"We are not advocating a voucher system, which in a sense, would do away with school boards."

Harris reserves some of his surest words for the community's concern with the rise in hate-motivated crime, and he charges past governments with "inaction."

"Both under the Liberals and NDP, when we've asked, 'Why won't you prosecute [hate crimes] under exisiting laws?' we've gotten the answer, 'Well, we don't think the law is tough enough and we don't want to lose.'

"Our view is, use the exisiting laws, take [cases] forward, prosecute [those charged]. If we're going to lose, then we can change the law. But to hide behind what they think is an inadequate law and not prosecute, we think is wrong.

"We would prosecute [hate crimes] to the fullest, and if the law proves inadaquate, doggone it, we're going to fight hard and tighten up the laws."

As part of its election coverage, The CJN sought interviews with all three major party leaders. As of last week, Premier Bob Rae's spokespeople said they were still trying to squeeze an interview in, but one did not come through prior to the paper's Friday deadline.

CJC HOLDS TRAINING SESSION

The political liaison committee of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, recently held a training session for volunteers who have been meeting with candidates in the provincial election in order to sensitize them to Jewish concerns. Ontario Election '95

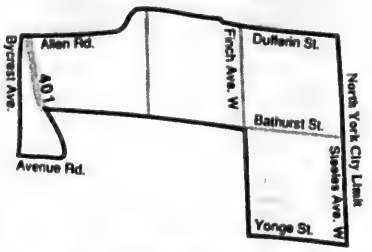
Candidates square off in Wilson Heights

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter



Monte Kwinter

Sam Pasternack

Claudia White

TORONTO — Ontario's most Jewish riding (50 per cent) is shaping up as a battle between the experienced Liberal incumbent and the straight-talking Tory underdog — both well-known figures in the Jewish community.

The New Democrats are off to a slow start, as their candidate, Claudia White, was nominated less than two weeks ago.

Also seeking election are Tom Salsberg of the Green Party, Dan Largy of the Family Coalition Party and David Yates for the Independent Reform Association of Ontario.

Going head to head are former Liberal cabinet minister Monte Kwinter, who wrested Wilson Heights from Conservative David Rotenberg a decade ago, and Tory hopeful Sam Pasternack, national commander of the 1,300-member Jewish War Veterans of Canada.

(Pasternack, 70, is no longer active in the Royal Canadian Legion, as was reported in a recent issue of The CJN.)

Pasternack says the 47 years he spent in the retail garment business taught him the dangers of waste and inefficiency.

He says he's finding an "angry and disgusted" electorate, "fed up" with government waste, spiraling deficits and rising welfare rolls.

But Pasternack adds he's encountered surprising support for his approach. He's promising little, only to implement as many of leader Mike Harris's policies as possible: reducing provincial income taxes by 30 per cent, cutting government spending and bureaucracy, instituting mandatory learn-and workfare, and eliminating barriers to employment.

An unabashed police booster (he's an honorary deputy chief of police of the Metro force), Pasternack says crime is also a concern for the riding's many elderly and immigrants.

Kwinter, 64, is banking in large measure on his record. He's confident of not only winning the riding but of returning to cabinet should the Liberals win.

Even though the issue is before the courts, Kwinter says voters are concerned about public funding for Jewish day schools.

He points out that personally, he's been a longtime supporter of full funding for private schools (although he supported the Liberals' opposition to it) and failing that, of giving education tax relief to parents of children in independent schools.

A Liberal government, he says, would reinstate the $400 a day limit for out-of-country OHIP coverage, cut back to $100 a day by the NDP. It's a big issue for seniors.

Kwinter has also been meeting members of the riding's large Russian Jewish community, whose chief concern is their inability to practise their professions because of strict rules in Ontario.

He's firm in his belief that a Liberal government would balance the budget in four years and then begin paring Ontario's debt.

White, a 33-year-old community worker, concedes she has her work cut out. Voters, she says, "have been very responsive" to her, particularly seniors in and around the Baycrest Centre who have concerns about health care and consent to treatment.

She says the NDP's record "stands on its own," with the government chalking up increased business investment, job creation and a deficit that's been reduced this year by one-third.

The social contract, she points out, has saved $2 billion and 40,000 jobs.

As well, the New Democrats have increased spending in areas that needed it most, such as radiation therapy, White says.

JEWISH FEDERATION OF GREATER TORONTO

A Year in Review...

From the President

The Federation has been through a difficult two-year period which coincided with my term in office. However, despite our pre-occupation with the problems of the JCC "rescue," the Federation moved forward on a number of fronts which I would like to highlight.

Financial Resource Development

The Morton Committee produced a framework from which we are developing our fundraising for the next century. Integrated organization, new governance and giving opportunities will lead to enhanced fundraising.

Jewish Education and Continuity

The Continuity Task Force finished its work and the Action Committee on Jewish Continuity was formed to promote and provide seed funding for new and innovative initiatives. The Education Commission has just completed its work with the report and recommendations to be forthcoming.

Federation Governance

New by-laws have been approved and implemented to enhance participation in Federation, as well as its effectiveness and efficiency.

Israel-Diaspora Relations

The first Toronto Leadership Mission began a process of re-defining this most significant of our community's relations - to the people of Israel.

Jewish Elder Services

The Federation is playing a central role in our community's work to secure provincial legislation to allow for the creation of a Jewish Multi-Service Agency (MSA) and to facilitate the merging of Baycrest and Senior Care.

National Immigrant Services

Together with other Canadian Federations through the Council of Jewish Federations of Canada, the Federation has been successful in moving toward localizing the accountability of Toronto and Montreal Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS) activities.

We were able to achieve these objectives through the dedication of our lay and professional leadership who performed under the most difficult of circumstances and produced outstanding results.

Bernard Ghert

Financial Resource Development

The Financial Resource Development Department, uniting all streams of gift giving, is now in place. United Jewish Appeal and the Federation's Bequest and Endowment Fund are the two most significant components of FRD. However, Financial Resource Development oversees fundraising from all possible sources, while, at the same time, paying close attention to donor needs. FRD is a new way of thinking in Federation fundraising.

United Jewish Appeal

Wendy Eisen and Bob Masters, Co-chairs
Barbara Bank, Women's Campaign Chair

United Jewish Appeal, is the single most important contributor to Federation financial resources. The annual campaign generates $35-40 million for local Jewish needs, to finance the rescue of Jews from distressed communities anywhere in the world and to support special services in Israel.

United Jewish Appeal relies on over 40,000 contributors and more than 2,000 volunteers to accomplish its objectives. One of UJA's most important priorities is expanding its contributor base with new divisions to serve segments of the community, such as Jewish Torontonians from Israel and South Africa.

In 1994, the Women's Campaign, with more than 25 new major gifts, accounted for $4 million of total UJA contributions. Outreach, especially to young women, is also a critical element of the Women's Campaign.

Bequest and Endowment Fund

Barrie Rose, Interim Chair

The Fund provides permanent financial resources which are prudently invested to meet community needs.

Gifts to the Bequest and Endowment Fund are generally made by cash, a bequest in a will and through life insurance, securities or assets that can be turned into cash.

The Fund sponsors scholarships for Jewish students in post-secondary institutions and for Jewish communal professionals. It also conducts a yearly seminar for up to 300 practitioners in accounting, law and estate planning.

Ontario Jewish Archives

Cyrel Troster, Chair

The Ontario Jewish Archives, which preserves the history of Jewish Ontario:

- served over 900 researchers from across Canada, the U.S. and Israel
- completed cataloguing records of the United Jewish Welfare Fund
- received a grant from the Canadian Council of Archives to process files from the Jewish Immigrant Aid Service Toronto office
- participated in the Spadina Festival street fair

Board of Jewish Education

Joseph M. Steiner, Chair

The Board administers through its Fiscal Committee a substantial number of subsidies to Jewish school students whose families cannot afford full tuition fees, and organizes professional development programs for teachers and administrators. It also operates a library on educational topics, an audio-visual department and a Teacher Creativity Centre. In 1994, BJE:

- expanded its teacher certification programs through the Midrasha L'Morim (Jewish Teachers Seminary)
- coordinated the highly successful annual Choir Festival (Zimriyah), Dance Festival (Rikudiyah), National Bible Contest and Book Month Creative Writing Contest
- initiated day-long conferences for supplementary school personnel and day school educators

Department for Human Resources Development

Francie Storm, Chair

The department, recruits, trains, places and provides development for volunteers and professionals.

During the past year, HRD:

- interviewed and referred over 100 volunteers to positions within our affiliated agencies
- conducted the first-ever bus tour of agency facilities for Federation board members
- arranged orientation workshops for board members
- welcomed over 400 Jewish newborns into the community through its "Welcome to the World" program

Holocaust Remembrance Committee

Eleanor Getzler, Chair

The Holocaust Remembrance Committee is committed, first and foremost, to preserving the Shoah's place in history. To accomplish this essential goal, the Committee strongly emphasizes anti-racism education. The past year's highlights of Committee activity include:

- a two day event commemorating the 50th anniversary of Liberation
- seminars for students and teachers attended by 1200 participants
- 20,000 student visitors to the Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre of Toronto at the Lipa Green Building

Community Planning & Allocations

Alan Sandler, Chair

Community Planning and Allocations (CP & A) addresses a wide variety of community needs through planning, policy setting, program development, budgeting and evaluation. Highlights of CP&A's work in 1994 include:

- the Action Committee for Jewish Continuity, established, under the chairmanship of Les Klein, as a direct result of the recent Task Force on Jewish Continuity report.
- the rescue and restructuring of the Jewish Community Centre into three independent organizations, through the efforts of Federation President Bernie Ghert, Federation officers and CP&A.
- A new Israel Experience committee, chaired by Lorraine Sandler, to better connect our community with Israel
- A major review of current and future services to new immigrants, initiated by the Integration Committee.

Jewish Women's Federation

Glennie Lindenberg, President

Jewish Women's Federation (JWF) is the umbrella for nearly 50 diverse Jewish women's volunteer organizations.

JWF's outreach programs, Shalom Toronto and Russian Integration helped to absorb new Canadians into our community, and Social & Political Action activities sensitized the community to issues affecting Jewish women.

Award Winners to be Honoured at Annual Meeting

Ben Sadowski Award of Merit

The Ben Sadowski Award is presented annually by the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto to an outstanding community leader.

This year's recipient is York University History and Humanities Professor SYDNEY EISEN.

Sydney is a former Faculty of Arts Dean at York, who was instrumental in establishing the university's Jewish Studies program, recruiting the first teachers of Judaica and assembling Jewish course offerings. Today, York University students can take advantage of courses in Jewish history, philosophy, language, literature, film, religion and social sciences.

Sydney also helped to found the Centre for Jewish Studies, to develop new areas of teaching and research in cooperation with the community and the Jewish Teachers' Education Program. The program, unique in North America, offers degrees in both Jewish and non-Jewish studies in conjunction with the Board of Jewish Education.

In addition to his York University contributions, Sydney has been active with the Federation, the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, Associated Hebrew Schools and the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education.

Leadership Development Awards

These annual awards were established to encourage the assumption of community leadership roles by young men and women. They are presented to those who demonstrate extraordinary community commitment and service.

Last year's UJA Women's Campaign chair, BARBARA BANK is this year's co-chair of the United Jewish Appeal Business Cabinet.

The 1995 Women's Campaign, under Barbara's leadership, raised $4 million. Barbara is also involved with Baycrest, the Mount Sinai Women's Auxiliary and United Synagogue Day Schools. Because of her reputation for hard work and humour, Barbara is among the community's most popular volunteers.

DAVID BARKIN is president of the Jewish Camp Council, chair of the Leadership Development planning committee and an active UJA canvasser.

He is a Leadership Development graduate, who takes on community volunteer tasks with enormous energy, commitment, compassion, honesty and insight.

Shem Tov Awards

These awards are presented annually to leaders representing the highest levels of excellence in volunteer service to Toronto's Jewish community.

ROSEANNE AIN, Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto - Roseanne is a graduate and past chair of the Federation's Leadership Development Program, who spends countless hours on community activity. Currently the Chair of UJA's New Gifts Cabinet, Roseanne has been involved with the Federation at several levels, in addition to volunteering at the Board of Jewish Education and the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto.

ROBERT BERKOVITZ, Reena Foundation - Robert has been a Reena volunteer since 1986. For the past year, he served as the organization's chairman. Robert believes strongly in the need to integrate developmentally handicapped individuals into the community. He has been a driving force behind Reena's new headquarters, the Toby and Henry Battle Centre in Thornhill.

GARRY FOSTER, Jewish Family & Child Service - Garry has just completed his two year term as president of JF&CS. Faced with the need for fiscal responsibility without service cutbacks, Garry introduced a new strategic plan that will serve as a road map for the agency during the next three years. In addition to accounting and business skills, Garry brings compassion and commitment to JF&CS.

ELLY GOTZ, Holocaust Remembrance Committee - During his many years of involvement with the Committee, Elly Gotz has spoken to thousands of students about the Holocaust. Until June 1944, Elly was confined to the ghetto in his hometown of Kovno, Lithuania, before being deported to the Dachau concentration camp. He was liberated in late April, 1945. Elly helped to found the Christian Jewish Dialogue subcommittee, which he has co-chaired for a decade.

DAVID GREEN, United Jewish Appeal David Green's connection to UJA covers nearly half a century. His fundraising efforts began as soon as the Second World War was over and David exchanged his military uniform for a civilian suit. David is chairman of UJA's Golden Givers Program, which honours contributors with at least a 25 year history of gift giving. David is an award winning fundraiser, who has collected hundreds of thousands of dollars for the community.

AARON LANDAU, Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living - Aaron has provided more than a decade of dedicated service to the Betel Centre. He is the Centre's immediate past president, who served on several committees before becoming vice-president in 1988, president two years later and chairman from 1992-1994. Outside the Centre, Aaron has supplied volunteer assistance to Holy Blossom Temple, the Casa Loma Historical Committee and the Inner City Angels. In 1985, he received a city of Toronto community service medal.

BEVERLY LYONS, Jewish Vocational Service - Beverly is immediate past president of Jewish Vocational Service, with a 15 year history at the agency. Her active volunteer life includes the Federation's Commission on Jewish Education, which she chairs, other Federation committees, the Alzheimers Foundation, the Kidney Foundation and Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue.

DR. MARVIN NASH, Jewish Camp Council of Toronto - A Jewish Camp Council board member since 1968, Marvin is a past president who still takes an active role in Council affairs. His presidency coincided with a difficult financial period, which he helped the Council overcome. Every summer, Marvin has made himself available to load camp buses and calm frightened first time campers. Marvin has also donated his time to the Ontario Association of Optometrists.

NYGH names lecture

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — North York General Hospital has named its annual lecture by a visiting professor the Sheila Cohen Lecture, in memory of a popular obstetrician and gynecologist who died last fall at the age of 51.

Dr. Mel Petersiel, chief of obstetrics and gynecology at the hospital, said her family's support "continues the academic knowledge and advancement we believe is important in a community hospital."

Cohen, he said, was "a pioneer in the treatment of young women, especially those with disabilities. She expended the time, effort and care very few would have.

"Sheila was an outstanding advocate for a warm, comfortable and secure hospital environment," Petersiel said.

"Her patients often had to wait hours to see her, but when they got into the examining room, it was as though there was all the time in the world, and they were the only people in the world."

Dr. Sheila Cohen

Her husband Bob described her as an "energetic, upbeat person. When she wanted to do something, she really went at it. She got a lot of joy out of helping others."

She was very involved with teenagers, he said, operating a teen clinic at North York General, and a gynecology clinic at Bloorview Children's Hospital, a facility for disabled youngsters.

Born in Ottawa, Cohen studied physical education at University of Toronto, then attended the University of Ottawa Medical School. She interned at Ottawa General Hospital and St. Boniface and Winnipeg General hospitals in Winnipeg, completing her medical education at the University of Toronto.

She had an "off the wall sense of humour and a keen sense of fun," he said, also describing her as an independent minded person with a strong sense of herself as well as compassion and empathy.

Her patients described her to him as deliberate, methodical and exhaustively thorough, he told The CJN.

Dr. Donna Stewart, who holds the University of Toronto Love Chair in Women's Health at the Toronto Hospital, gave the first Sheila Cohen Lecture.

York U graduate helps Russia deal with environment

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — When Jonathan Burke went to Rio de Janeiro for the Earth Summit World Conference on environment and population in 1992, he never dreamed that his participation would lead him to deal with enviromental problems in Russia.

A graduate in political science and environmental studies at York University, Burke was offered a six-month contract by Earth Day International to set up a national organization in Russia.

When his contract ended, there were no more funds for his work, but Burke was determined to continue with the project on his own. He began raising money in Russia and Canada, gaining corporate and individual support and raising awareness of environmental issues.

In a recent interview with The CJN when he visited his family here, Burke says he found the ecological environment in Russia in a turmoil. There was no coordination and no mechanism to champion environmental issues under Communism.

Only on rare occasions did the population respond on a national level, such as when they objected to the industrial pollution of Lake Bikal, a national treasure and the largest lake in the world, and after the disaster at the Chernobyl nuclear plant.

Today, 10 people work on the project in Russia. Burke says, "We are becoming well organized. We have a computer network called Glasnet, which links environmentalists around the country."

Working with business and government, Burke has spearheaded a recycling program for new products arriving in Russia, such as plastic and aluminum, which are creating new problems.

Burke says his task goes far beyond ecological concerns. At York he discovered that "environmental studies and political science intertwine."

Recognizing that there were many social problems in Russia, he began programs to help feed the elderly and the disabled. He points out that the elderly receive a pension of about $70 a month, or less.

In Moscow, he created a Babushka Relief Fund (feed grandmas), which is much like the meals-on-wheels program. "The adopt a needy person project is growing and volunteers attend to the other needs of the elderly or disabled when delivering meals," he says.

He also initiated a children's coloring book project for schools, using environmental topics.

Burke recently attended the 25th anniversary of Earth Day at a conference in New York and he escorted two Russian environmentalists to see projects in the Toronto area.

Earth Day is on April 22 each year to bring awareness of global environmental issues, but the work of the organizations continues throughout the year.

Now the director of Earth Day in Russia, which has 120 organizations around the country, Burke, 25, says, "We made millions of dollars destroying the environment and now there is an opportunity to make millions by cleaning up the environment."

He says there are environmental catastrophies all over Russia, "but there is also a strong and growing environmental movement and examples of positive environmental actions from one side of the country to the other that need positive recognition."

David Jacobs

Dear friend,

This is a crucial election for Ontario. A great many issues have been raised, but what is really at stake are our fundamental principles of tzedek and tikkun olam. I've worked for these objectives all my life.

Bob Rae and the NDP have faced difficult times but chose to protect – and even improve – vital services like health care. We've made tough but fair decisions, tempered with compassion. WE won't make unrealistic promises that don't add up.

I'm asking for your support and your vote in St. Andrew-St. Patrick. You can count on me to work hard to protect what's important to you.

Sincerely,

David Jacobs

Toronto employees get paid leave

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jewish City of Toronto employees are claiming a minor victory following a recent city council decision that would give non-Christian staff two days of paid time off for religious holidays, if they work Christmas and Good Friday at straight pay.

Council voted 11-6 to offer the option on a trial basis, and to try to get union agreement for it.

The decision means Jewish staff would be able to simply "swap" Christmas and Good Friday for two religious holidays, said City of Toronto employee Rachelle Posen.

Until now, Jewish staff had to take Jewish holidays as either paid vacation or unpaid days off, Posen told The CJN.

Under the new option, they would get two Jewish holy days with pay and work on Christmas and Easter at straight pay, she said, adding there is enough work to keep staff busy on those days.

"This is not just a Jewish issue. It recognizes the diversity of the population," said Posen, who works for the city's management services department.

The option goes some way toward alleviating the plight of the fully observant, who could need up to 13 days off in a calendar year, provided all Jewish holy days fall on a weekday.

Coun. Kyle Rae, who championed the move, said it's unfair to expect non-Christian staff to use vacation pay or take unpaid time off for religious observance.

But the idea came in for harsh criticism from Coun. David Hutcheon, who called it "an attack on the Christian religion" and said it's "unfair to discriminate against the majority."

The next step is up to the unions, in whose collective agreements time-and-a-half pay for Christmas and Easter is long enshrined.

That's why Coun. Tom Jakobek has criticized the idea, saying it would be unfair for non-Christian staff to be paid for religious days off, on top of getting premium pay for working Christmas and Easter.

But Posen said the city has requested that the option be placed in a special program clause under Ontario's Human Rights Code.

Mayor Barbara Hall said the option is an attempt to accommodate all faiths and does not slight anyone.

Hall said she works on Jewish holidays, and "in no way" would she view members of other religions working on Christian holidays as criticism of Christianity.

Teachers fight issue in the courts

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Jewish teachers in four Winnipeg area school divisions are going to court over paid leave for Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur.

The action, involving over 75 teachers from Winnipeg School Division No. 1, Seven Oaks, Assiniboine South and Fort Garry School divisions, follows a Supreme Court of Canada decision last summer that ruled a Quebec school board had to take reasonable measures to accommodate Jewish teachers seeking paid religious leave.

The Supreme Court ruled 9-0 that three Jewish teachers working for a Catholic school board near Montreal were wrongly docked a day's pay for missing work on Yom Kippur, 1985.

The Winnipeg teachers have charged that school board policies, collective agreements and provincial regulations on the school year violate the Charter of Rights and Freedoms and the Manitoba Human Rights Code.

"The issue is that teachers should be allowed to exercise their religious rights without impediment," said Mel Myers, the lawyer representing the Manitoba Teachers Society and the Jewish teachers involved in the case.

"Everybody gets Christmas, Boxing Day and Good Friday off whether they want it or not. That is not equitable."

John Wiens, Seven Oaks School Division's superintendent, said he supports people's rights to take religious holidays off.

"The difficulties with this matter are how far we may have to bend for other religious groups or for more Orthodox Jewish teachers who may want to take off all the holidays," he said.

"At some point, it becomes an economic problem, even though the school board supports human rights. Hopefully, we can reach some compromise through negotiations."

Currently, Seven Oaks allows Jewish teachers to take off the three days of Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur, but those who do have to pool money to pay for substitutes.

"We try to employ as few substitutes as possible to keep costs down," Wiens said.

Assiniboine South allows one day's paid leave for Jewish holidays, while Winnipeg No. 1, the city's largest school division, allows two days off with pay.

"This will have to play out through the courts," said Anita Neville, chair of Winnipeg No. 1's board of trustees.

In Fort Garry, reports Richard Swyston, president of the Port Garry School Division Teachers Association (and one of the Jewish teachers involved in the legal action), non-Christian teachers can book off for religious holidays but are either docked pay or have to pay for substitutes.

So far, there has been no formal response from any of the school divisions. Myers expects a fall hearing.

Detention helped Cass become debating champ

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It's entirely possible that Randy Cass, 24, would never have become an international debating champion if he hadn't got a detention as a high school student.

About nine years ago, Cass was penalized for a minor infraction of school rules at Upper Canada College. He was given the option of participating in a debating tournament because the team was short a debater.

"I had a blast," Cass said of the experience.

Now finished his second year at the University of Toronto's Faculty of Law, Cass is a veteran of tournaments in North America, England, Ireland and Russia.

Randy Cass

At a Canadian University Society of Intercollegiate Debating tournament held in Lennoxville, Que., Cass was selected top speaker. His Hart House Debating Society team placed first out of 70 teams.

Earlier this year, Cass was selected one of the top 10 university debaters in the world in an international tournament at Princeton, N.J.

His debating skills have earned him a number of other awards — among them 1994-95 North American Debating Champion, 1993-94 Central Canadian Public Speaking Champion and Public Speaking Champion for three consecutive years (1990-92) at the University of Western Ontario, where he studied business. He describes his debating style as "straightforward."

Even before his first high school debate, Cass took part in an inter-school debate at Holy Blossom Temple's religious school, which he attended following his elementary school years at Leo Baeck Day School. His topic was What's More Important in the Jewish Faith — Great Jewish Military Leaders or Great Intellectuals?

Last year Cass argued for the prosecution of elderly Nazi war criminals during the semi-finals of the North American championships. "My partner [Montrealer Avery Plaw] and I were both Jewish, but we never brought that out in the debate. It was a common sense debate.

"[We argued that] the law is not a game of hide and seek where if you stay hidden long enough, you don't have to answer for your crimes."

Cass' debating experience has taught him that "there's a credible argument to almost anything," he said.

'Donations' campaign launched by NIF

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

Avi Armoni

TORONTO — An Israeli citizen can get a tax write-off for donating money to a football team but not to a civil rights association.

That situation, which poses but one obstacle for philanthropically-inclined Israelis and worthy causes, could change as early as next year because of a current three-pronged campaign to change the "culture of giving" in Israel.

The project was launched in November by the New Israel Fund (NIF), a group supporting Israeli grassroots organizations that deal with social and economic issues.

The campaign, which focuses on tax reform, public attitudes and fundraising techniques, has become a priority for Avi Armoni, the fund's director in Israel. He visited Toronto and Montreal recently to meet with local NIF supporters.

Philanthropy in Israel — or, more accurately, its relatively low percentage — has been an increasingly important issue for Armoni since he joined the fund in 1991.

The Diaspora Jewish community donates about $1.4 billion (US) to Israeli causes, said Armoni. Israeli philanthropy, in contrast, totals under $100,000 (US) annually. In the United States that translates to a $165 annual donation per person, as compared to about $14 per person in Israel.

In Israel individuals and small businesses account for 22 per cent of all giving to the non-profit sector, compared to 90 per cent in the United States, said Armoni.

According to an NIF press release, many Israeli Jews view fundraising as "aggressive" and "unseemly." High taxes in Israel contribute to negative attitudes toward philanthropy.

The issue of Israeli giving was brought to public light last year when Israel's deputy foreign minister, Yossi Beilin, announced that Israelis no longer need American support.

Armoni disagrees. "There is a need for philanthropic dollars in Israel," he said in an interview at the Toronto offices of the New Israel Fund of Canada. "There is a need for philanthropy to remain...in the spirit of Kol Yisrael Areivim Zeh Lazeh (all of Israel is responsible for one another)."

He does agree with Beilin that Israelis "can give and should give to charities in Israel," and has suggested that Israelis could join with Diaspora partners to fund international projects in places like Russia.

The NIF campaign kicked off with a Tel Aviv conference, at which Beilin was keynote speaker.

Armoni emphasizes that Israelis "have a strong tradition of tzedakah and volunteerism. If there is a disaster, people open their homes to strangers."

AIDS QUILT TO BE DEDICATED

As a result of a successful Mitzvah Making Day program at Temple Emanu-el last fall, young adults from the the pre-confirmation class created an 'AIDS quilt.' Each patch of the quilt (seen above) honors individual Jews who died of AIDS. The quilt will be dedicated to the memory of Aisha Howard, a former member of the congregation who was active in the AIDS community. The service will take place on Friday, June 2 at 8:30 p.m. at Temple Emanu-el.

Opposition parties reject Golan withdrawal

Show solidarity with residents in area

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Likud and Tsomet party leaders visited the Golan Heights Sunday to show solidarity with residents battling the threat of withdrawal.

Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu and party activists, including nine other MKs, visited Kibbutz Elrom — the leading candidate for dismantling in the first stage of any peace accord with Syria.

Netanyahu charged that the government, having won the support of many Golan residents in the elections, including most Elrom members, was now selling them out.

"I can say with certainty that the government is no longer negotiating over the Golan, but over the demilitarization of parts of the Galilee," he told Elrom members and Golan Heights residents committee officials.

Tsomet MKs, led by party leader Rafael Eitan, made their stand at Nukeib, a former Syrian stronghold overlooking Kibbutz Ein Gev on the Kinneret's eastern shore.

Eitan said it was "inconceivable" that a nation's leaders would yield on the negotiating table what the country's sons had won on the battlefield.

For their part, Druze residents were more optimistic about the prospects of peace and of again being under Syrian rule.

"I believe everything is ready for a peace accord and that it is only a matter of time," said one Druze leader.

"We have waited a long time, but now it is on the horizon and I hope one day soon the sun will rise and we will be back under Syrian rule and peace will reign in the region for the benefit of all," he said.

Even among more pro-Israeli Druze, there was no anxiety or concern at the prospects of a "Druze Villages First" deal as the first stage of a peace accord.

"We have been here under the Turks. The British were here and the Israelis. We will stay here in our homes and on our land, if it is returned to Syria or not, and that's the difference between us and the Jewish settlers," said one.

Rabin: Obligation to build Jerusalem for all residents

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — The following is the text of Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin's speech last Sunday night, part of a publicly broadcast ceremony held to honor of the 28th anniversary of Jerusalem's reunification.

Speaking just days after the Jerusalem land expropriations were frozen, Rabin declared:

"All governments of Israel, including the present government, have been fully confident that what was determined in 1967, what was legislated in 1988 — transforming Jerusalem into a unified city under Israeli sovereignty, the capital of Israel, the heart of the Jewish people — these are facts that will endure for eternity.

"All governments of Israel have accepted upon themselves the commitment to respect the sanctity of Jerusalem, for other religions as well, and all governments of Israel have preserved — and this government will continue to preserve — freedom of religion and freedom of access ... to their holy sites.

"The government's effort is, obviously, to maintain a set of relations for the development of Jerusalem. I refer to united Jerusalem, in accordance with the decisions of the government and the Knesset, for the benefit of all the city's residents ... It is our obligation to continue building Jerusalem for the good of all its residents.

"We are the sovereign, we are the official rulers in united Jerusalem, and as a Jewish state, we must also be tolerant and we must also ensure the civil rights of all people living in united Jerusalem.

"Next year, we will celebrate the 3000th anniversary of Jerusalem's establishment. I hope that these celebrations ... [do not] ignore the fact of its sanctity and of its status as a very important city also for members of other religions and for its non-Jewish residents," Rabin stated.

Israel's cabinet declared that it "will act to strengthen the status of united Jerusalem as the exclusive capital of Israel and will fight any attempt to impair this status.

"The cabinet, in cooperation and coordination with the Municipality of Jerusalem, will do its utmost for the continued strengthening and prosperity of Jerusalem for the welfare of all its residents of all nations and religions," it added.

of Likud leaders hostile to a deal on the Golan would certainly suggest that conclusion to Assad."

While Assad knows time is running out for a deal, Christopher said, he will never display any hurry, since it could undercut his bargaining stance.

"You will never see a quality of desperation from Assad. He is too meticulous and controlled for that," Christopher said.

Israel's Channel 1 reported Sunday night that an unnamed Israeli businessman had held an unspecified number of meetings with a nephew of Assad in different European capitals.

It said the meetings were taking place with the direct authorization of Deputy Foreign Minister Yossi Beilin and with Rabin's knowledge.

According to the report, the nephew is the son of Assad's brother Rifat and a meeting was held at the home of Syrian Defence Minister Mustafa Tlas's daughter in Paris last January.

Officials in Rabin's office said they have no knowledge of such meetings. Beilin was not available for comment.

There is speculation that the Israeli may have been Nimrod Novik, a former government adviser turned businessman.

Not on Shabbat

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Israel's national air carrier, El Al, will continue its longstanding policy of not flying on Shabbat, Transportation Minister Yisrael Kessar has said.

His statement last Wednesday came amid word that the privatization of the airline could lead to a change in policy.

Kessar stressed that even if the majority of ownership in the airline goes to a private stockholder, the Shabbat policy would not change.

Security tight as Berlin Jews dedicate centre

By BELINDA COOPER
Special to The CJN

BERLIN — In a ceremony that teetered between the impressive and the pompous, Berlin's Jewish community recently dedicated its new Centrum Judaicum, a Jewish centre in what once was Germany's largest Jewish house of prayer, the New Synagogue.

An attack the night before on a synagogue in the northern city of Lubeck — for the second time in a little over a year — lent the ceremony special significance, and made for especially tight security. Hundreds of green-clad, machine-gun toting police guarded the magnificent golden-domed building on Oranienburgerstrasse; the prostitutes who usually line this main tourist drag had vanished; traffic was halted for blocks; and sharpshooters lined the roofs of surrounding buildings.

After having their bags checked by security guards, 3,000 guests and numerous journalists crowded into the open-air courtyard behind the synagogue, on the site of what was once the main hall of prayer.

In addition to German Chancellor Helmut Kohl and the head of the German Jewish community, Ignatz Bubis, guests included a group of Jewish police from New York and several hundred former Jewish citizens of Berlin invited back for the ceremony. The audience also included Berlin's most prominent Jewish and non-Jewish citizens — just as the synagogue's original dedication in 1866 had done.

The Berlin Jewish community at that time was at the height of its prosperity and confidence. The synagogue, built in the Moorish style popular at the time (which led some anti-Semites to accuse the Jews of emphasizing their foreigness), was a centre of the Berlin community.

On Kristallnacht, in November 1938, the synagogue escaped destruction because of the bravery of police chief Wilhelm Krotzfeld, who had the fire department put out the first fires set by Nazi thugs. During this year's ceremonies, a plaque was put up in Krotzfeld's honor.

The last religious service was held in the building in 1940; the German army later used it as an office and storage depot.

Badly damaged in 1943 by Allied bombers, the New Synagogue was partly demolished — like many other surviving synagogues in both parts of Germany — in 1958. Few protested; many Jews neither expected nor wanted Jewish life to continue in Germany anyway.

The new Centrum Judaicum contains a small synagogue and a mikvah, but it will be mainly a centre of Jewish activity and education.

At the dedication, Jerzy Kanal, leader of the Berlin Jewish community, said, "We will strive to fill this building with Jewish intellectual life. We want to make it a place where all Berliners can find out about Judaism, and help Jewish people to find their Jewish identity on a religious, scholarly and traditional basis."

Berlin's Jewish population has grown enormously in the last few years, mainly through an influx of Russian Jews; the official count is now 10,000, while unofficial estimates put it as high as four times that many.

To some observers, a building as imposing and magnificent as the Centrum Judaicum seems, disturbingly, to be more facade than content in a country with so few Jews. The question often asked in recent days has been whether Jewish life really has any future in Berlin. Berlin Mayor Eberhard Diepgen spoke at the ceremony of a "new epoch in Jewish life."

But Jews are more reserved. Historian Andreas Nachama, an active member of the Jewish community who was also very involved in the commemorations of May 8, is skeptical: "I think in Berlin, the most important city in central Europe, there will be an insignificant Jewish community."

But he refused to make any predictions. "When I was bar mitzvah in 1963, the rabbi said there would be only 800 Jews in Berlin in the year 2000. So I don't want to be a prophet."

May 22:

• A heat wave descended upon Israel. The hot, heavy desert wind from the Arabian peninsula scorched the country. In Jerusalem temperatures reached 38C, in the Kineret 40C, along the coastal plain 36C, and in Eilat 46C.

• Shimon Peres met with Yasser Arafat and pledged Israel will do its utmost to conclude negotiations on the interim agreement by July 1. Israel agreed to grant 4,000 additional work permits to Palestinians, bringing the total number to 34,750.

May 23:

• Ha'aretz reported that Prime Minister Rabin met with senior government officials to discuss the state of negotiations with the Palestinians. According to the newspaper, the prime minister was told that Yasser Arafat had taken a tougher stand against terrorism and that the Palestinian Authority had taken positive steps to curb terror in Gaza.

• Osama el-Baz, an advisor to President Mubarak, visited Israel. El-Baz met with both Prime Minister Rabin and Foreign Minister Peres. During his meetings, he spoke of Egypt's desire to improve relations and cooperation in the wake of recent tensions that arose between the countries.

May 24:

• Ha'aretz reported that San Marino, a small state located within Italy, with a total population of 23,000 and covering an area of 61 kilometers, has decided to establish full diplomatic relations with Israel.

May 25:

• During his visit to Israel, Prime Minister Rabin advised Russia's Deputy Foreign Minister Victor Posavalyuk that Iran is leading a war against the peace process and is trying to destabilize the region. Iran finances and coordinates the activities of extremist Islamic terrorist organizations.

• According to Kol Israel, Israel will soon begin drilling for water in Jordanian territory in the Arava region.

May 26:

• Dr. Yaakov Adler, a former director general of Magen David Adom, has been appointed Deputy Medical Director for United Nations Peacekeeping Forces. He is the first Israeli to receive such an appointment from the UN.

• Yediot Aharanot reported that former Chief of Staff Ehud Barak will soon be appointed to the Cabinet.

Jewish groups welcome war crimes action

Earlier, Rock and Immigration Minister Sergio Marchi had stated that authorities would commence legal actions against only four suspected Nazi war criminals out of 12 files that had been completed by Justice's war crimes unit. That policy came under fire from Jewish groups, which accused the government of tokenism and of pursuing a go-slow approach. Last week's announcement was applauded by Jewish organizations, some seeing it as a watershed event.

"We're delighted. We've been pushing for taking action in all the cases as soon as it is feasible," said Canadian Jewish Congress spokesperson Jack Silverstone. "We regard this as a breakthrough. [Government spokespeople] had been very adamant about holding to four cases."

"We believe it's very significant in that the government has gone beyond its original committment to bring forward only four cases this year," said B'nai Brith Canada spokesperson Paul Marcus. "We hope the logjam has been loosened. We urge the government to keep up the momentum, show leadership and bring forward all remaining cases without delay."

Recent developments indicate "Mr. Rock is a man of his word," said Sol Littman, Canadian representative of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre. "They've already proceeded with greater speed and a greater number of cases than the previous government did in five years. It's very encouraging."

Though he declined to comment on the specifics of the cases, Reporter said: "The minister always stated, there wasn't a token four [cases] or a ceiling of four. Four would be started" and because they had been successfully initiated, others could also be launched, he said.

Reporter acknowledged that Justice was also initiating deportation proceedings against several suspected Somali war criminals. "There are common principles involved in terms of ensuring that Canada is not going to be a haven for war criminals," he said.

Silverstone suggested that "momentum is building" and it appears "the government sees the proceedings against [alleged]war criminals as part of their ordinary mandate...If we get a number of cases going, it would become part of the routine administration of justice in the country, not some cause celebre."

Gazit doubts peace process

[Cont'd. from page 1]

The agreements will take years, Gazit reasons, because Israel's immediate neighbors do not see peace as a priority. For now, he asserts, problems at home take precedence over normalization with Israel.

Take Syria, which last week agreed to a framework for further discussion with Israel over the Golan Heights.

"Syria is facing very serious domestic economic problems," Gazit said. "For Syria not to regain the Golan Heights in the immediate future in not an urgent issue."

There are also internal pressures within Egypt, which Gazit said is being forced to adopt an anti-Israel stance to pacify its fundamentalist population, and within Lebanon, which cannot shake Syrian control.

Gazit does not foresee a breakthrough in Palestinian-Israeli negotiations before the December deadlines for Palestinian elections, but said he is "optimistic about the Palestinian track in the longer run," even if Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin fails to return Labor to power.

"The breakthrough is not the personal achievement of [PLO leader Yasser] Arafat on the one hand and Rabin and [Foreign Minister Shimon] Peres on the other. It is the outcome of the overall conditions in the world, in the Middle East, in Israel and among the Palestinians ... The rest is tactics."

For now, Gazit is taking the peace process "with a pinch of salt.

"We have to be very careful not to undertake any agreements that might be dangerous to our security, because if tomorrow circumstances change, and if [the Arab countries] feel there is a chance — 10, 15 or 20 years down the road — to have a smashing military victory, then to hell with the agreement."

Robin Kay:Retail chain head

Clothing for the environmentally conscious

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

"Taking a garment from a thread on a cone to putting it in a store is extremely intense," says Robin Kay, knitwear manufacturer and head of the Robin Kay retail chain.

So she was understandably wary when her husband, who is also her business manager, suggested they move into environmentally conscious products.

Adding another facet to the arduous process of manufacturing and retailing knitwear was not something she wanted to do, she says. But after many long talks with her husband, Keir Brownstone, she became infused with his passion for the environment and got excited about the idea.

"Once I understood the essence of his environmental conversations, I couldn't help but become very keen about it," she said. "I'm very grateful he insisted on it and enlightened me towards it and that I have enough perception to pick it up and turn it into material goods."

Since the end of the '80s, Robin Kay has grown into the world's largest chain of environmental stores.

In the 13 stores — 12 across Canada and one in Santa Monica, Calif. — 20 per cent of the featured clothing is made with unbleached, undyed cotton or with geneticaly colored cotton, a fabric that requires no dyeing since it is bred to grow in either soft brown or heather green. The stores also carry a line of towels, linens and bedsheets in unbleached, undyed cotton and other environmentally conscious housewares.

An eclectic mix of merchandise

Kay said many of her customers are unaware they are buying environmentally conscious clothing, "but they buy it because it looks good." She calls that "unconscious environmentalism," adding "we should be purely and truly unconscious about our enviromentalism — it should be that natural for us."

Noting that "what we buy, how we buy it, how much we do or don't buy and what we do with it afterwards," have a major impact on the environment, Kay said she is proud her company has been able to give customers the option of purchasing products created without harming the environment.

Originally from Winnipeg, Kay opened her first store on Bellair Street in Toronto's Yorkville district in 1978. "I didn't find that I worked well for other people," she recalled, "and I think this is an important characteristic of entrepreneurial people."

She sold an eclectic mix of merchandise, including used clothing, pieces made by local designers and army uniforms, and lived upstairs from the shop.

It was after moving the business a couple of blocks over to Hazelton Avenue that Kay first set eyes on a "fantastic" knitted cotton sweater, brought in by designer Judith Adam. "I thought this sweater deserved to be more than a sweater. I designed a line with her of pieces, and I devoted the entire store to that collection," she said.

The two women ended up going their separate ways, and Kay set up her own factory. In the early '80s most commercial knitters preferred to work with synthetics. It was a struggle, she remembers, but she eventually found a knitter willing to use cotton. Today the Robin Kay head office, located in a warehouse on Dufferin Street, houses several electronic knitting machines, a design space and offices.

After 17 years in business, Robin Kay has 70 employees. There are plans to open a 14th store in Vancouver this fall, and the company recently started wholesaling in the United States.

Robin Kay moved into environmentally conscious products on her husband's advice

Revenue have climbed toward the $5-million mark, according to a recent Globe and Mail article, which puts the company squarely in the major leagues. Kay, however, raised her guard when asked to comment on the sales figures. "I don't feel it's relevant. I feel what's relevant is what you see and how it's projected because I feel you get too classified by these numbers."

But on the subject of running a business in Canada, especially an all-Canadian company, Kay is willing to speak her mind. "Taking on manufacturing in Canada with taxes and labor is very difficult. It's very costly, it's very stressful.

Quality control maintained

"The cost of maintaining our machinery here is very high. We could manufacture for probably a quarter of the price offshore, but our efforts and part of our mission statement as a company is to be a Canadian company, so the financial questions that one is interested in are far beyond what do you do in sales per year," she said.

It is essential for her to manufacture here and oversee the process, Kay says. "I don't want to sell a sweater that will fall apart in two or three years. Our sweaters stand the test of time. I can see the cutters cutting these sweaters here and I can see the sewers sewing them up, and I know that the quality control is extremely high."

She expects that Robin Kay will continue to grow because it has wholeheartedly embraced environmentalism and she "believes very much" in the environmental positioning of the company. "I think that the company has tremendous potential," she said.

Kay combines the demands of running the business with raising a family — Jacob, 13, Brooklyn, 9, and Zoe, 4. Pondering her daily juggling act, she said, "Mothering is a profession in itself and needs thought and time, so the challenge is the balance.

"I work the thousand hours that are available per week. I'm always working whether I'm here or at home, and I love it."

Halifax sole Canadian port for Zim Israel

By JOEL JACOBSON
CJN Maritimes Correspondent

HALIFAX — While Zim Israel Navigation may do business in 250 ports worldwide, for the past 23 years its sole port of call in Canada has been Halifax — and it's destined to remain so for many years to come.

As Zim celebrates 50 years of operation, the Israeli-based shipping company has solidified its position as the largest carrier in Halifax by talking of a long-term, company-wide expansion that includes extra calls to the Atlantic port and the addition of three more ships to its fleet, bringing the total number of vessels to 15.

Zim now averages one call every eight days in Halifax.

"We value the business of the area and the excellent service we have received in the port of Halifax," said Zim Canada president Judith Schlesinger.

To celebrate Zim's 50th anniversary, Zim Canada and the Halifax Port Corporation sponsored a two-month exhibition of Saint John, N.B., artist Fred Ross' work at the Art Gallery of Nova Scotia. The Art of Fred Ross: A Timeless Humanism was officially opened by Schlesinger and Port Corporation head Merv Russell.

Founded in 1945, Zim has called at Halifax since 1972, three years after the opening of the Halterm container pier in the city's south end.

"We bring goods through Halifax to the rest of Canada and send Canadian goods to the rest of the world," said Donald Pelley, Zim Canada's Maritimes general manager.

"Each voyage starts in Israel but the percentage of Israeli cargo is insignificant. Our ships are constantly picking up and dropping goods along their routes."

Pelley said 90 per cent of cargo arriving in Halifax is destined for Ontario and Quebec. It is shipped inland by rail.

Zim employs 12 people in its Halifax office and another 50 at the Canadian head office in Montreal. Each of its ships carries the equivalent of 1,500 12-metre containers.

Quebec, Israeli firms ink cooperation pact

TEL AVIV — The Mouvement des Caisses Desjardins, Quebec's largest financial institution, has signed a cooperation agreement with Bank Hapoalim.

The agreement was signed by Jocelyn Proteau, president of the Federation des Caisses Populaires Desjardins de Montreal, and Amiram Sivan, chair of the Bank Hapoalim management board.

Hapoalim and Desjardins say they will work to develop joint banking activities in the areas of investment and financial service.

The move is designed to make future business activities between Quebec and Israeli interests more convenient and effective.

Two dozen Desjardins officers and Quebec business executives were in recently Israel for a ground-breaking business mission. The Desjardins delegation toured Bank Hapoalim facilities and met with Israeli executives in various commercial fields.

The mission is to be followed by bi-annual delegations from the Desjardins Group, and from Israeli industrialists.

The Mouvement des Caisses Desjardins is the umbrella for 1,300 associated credit unions operating throughout Quebec, including a branch in Cote St. Luc.

It provides a range of banking services, including those of the international level. The Desjardins group's assets are $80 billion.

With more than $40 billion (US) in assets, Bank Hapoalim maintains 364 branches in Israel and 17 other countries.

Visiting Israel were Joshua Ronn, Herb Lukofsky, Bernard Dalbec, Yves Merette, Claude-R. Tetu, and Pierre Brunet of the Desjardins group.

Members of the Desjardins delegation combined their business mission with a tour of Jerusalem.

All-natural ice cream introduced

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The most popular ice cream in the United States has just been introduced into the Canadian market.

Breyer's All Natural Ice Cream along with the chocolated-layered ice cream dessert Viennetta, both kosher products, were launched into Canada's $365 million-a-year ice cream market by Good Humor-Breyers, the ice cream division of Unilever Canada.

The company is embarking on an aggressive advertising campaign, including billboard ads and radio and television spots, beginning this month and running through most of the summer.

The company plans to spend as much promoting Breyer's ice cream and Viennetta as is currently spent advertising all other Canadian brands combined, according to Ken Weir, a brand manager in Good Humor-Breyers' marketing division. "The ice cream category as a whole hasn't seen a lot of advertising," he said.

Breyers ice cream contains no artificial preservatives, colors or stabilizers. A new technique enables the company to make ice cream without emulsions or stabilizers without compromising the shelf life of the product.

Used in ice creams to keep costs down and increase shelf life, additives have no harmful effects, maintains Jim Summers, director of research and development for Breyers ice cream in Canada. Weir said, however, that additive-free ice cream tastes better.

In the '80s, market research indicated that health-conscious consumers wanted certain preservatives removed from their diets, Weir said.

"As a consumer-focused company — Breyers sells by meeting or exceeding our customers expectations — we recognized this new consumer attitude not as a fad but as an emerging long-term trend and re-examined the way we made ice cream."

Available at supermarkets and specialty stores, Breyers All Natural Ice Cream in nine flavors and Vienetta in chocolate and vanilla, will be promoted through in-store samplings, as well as sampling programs at the CN Tower, Ontario Place, Canadian Open, Canadian Tennis Championships and Molson Indy.

Ashkenaz festival brings Yiddish culture to T.O.

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Ashkenaz is coming to Harbourfront July 4 to 9.

In what promises to be one of the largest Yiddish festival of the arts held anywhere in the world, Ashkenaz is bringing to Toronto the culture and lifestyle of the Yiddish-speaking world of Eastern Europe.

The many performing art spaces ranging from Molson Place to the Water's Edge Cafe will be alive with the sound of klezmer bands, Yiddish storytellers, actors giving voice to Jewish content plays, and to top it all off a parade through Harborfront the afternoon of July 9, with giant puppets, noisemakers and musicians.

"In size and scope there has never been anything like it," said Ashkenaz artistic director David Buchbinder.

The multi-media opera Golem by electronic music pioneer Richard Lowe Teitelbaum, with an international cast, and the avant-garde jazz quartet Masada, led by John Zorn of New York, are part of a double bill July 5 and 6 at the DuMaurier Theatre.

That is to be followed July 7 and July 8 in the same locale by a double bill of the famous Travelling Jewish Theatre of San Francisco performing Snake Talk and the innovative Liz Lerman Dance Exchange of Washington, D.C., performing In This Moment. In Snake Talk three characters emerge out of one woman, a Jewish immigrant mother, an artist and a street crone, and they take us through the worlds of aging and death, jealousy, creation, transformation and survival. Details of a gala opening, July 4, at the DuMaurier Theatre will be announced later.

The Winnipeg Jewish Theatre is coming to town to perform Sheldon Oberman's award-winning powerful children's play The Always Prayer Shawl, a treat for the whole family. Among other fea-

Joan Rivers discusses how one can survive anything

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

Joan Rivers

TORONTO — There's a scene in Joan Rivers' autobiographical TV movie, Tears and Laughter, which aired last year, that contrasts starkly with her life today. In it, she sits tearfully clutching the suicide note left for her by her late husband, moaning softly, "I'm not a survivor. I'm not a survivor."

For the better part of the past year, however, the sixtyish comedian has been on the lecture circuit discussing How to Survive Anything. Next Tuesday she will appear at Roy Thomson Hall as part of the Conversations lecture series.

Following the 1987 death of her husband Edgar Rosenberg after 22 years of marriage, Rivers was inundated with letters and phone calls from people who wanted her advice on getting through their own grief.

"That's how this whole lecture thing started," Rivers told The CJN during a phone interview last week from New York.

Now she is working on a book about survival, scheduled to come out next spring.

There are a number of other projects on the go: she still sells her eponymous line of jewelry on the QVC shopping network and has a book on jewelry due out this fall; there are cable TV specials in the works and a play she was scheduled to read.

To her great disappointment, the Broadway play she co-wrote and starred in last year, Sally Marr...and her Escorts, is no longer running.

"Push forward," she advises. "You can't change what happened in the past."

The hectic pace of her life is evident from the moment she picks up the phone. "I'm waiting for another call, so we may be interrupted. Let's talk fast."

Ten minutes later, it's, "The other phone call just came in. Can I call you back?"

Fifteen minutes later: "Where were we?" and the interview continues.

Rivers is convinced that "everyone can get through everything if you just know how." Although she's serious now, she switches deftly to humor mode, comparing survival to getting through childbirth and mimicking the pregnant woman who wonders, "How is it ever going to get out of me?"

Even in her darkest moments — including the failure of her late-night talk show which precipitated her husband's suicide — Rivers never lost her sense of humor, which she describes as "seeing reality through a cracked mirror.

"I think my humor gets me through everything."

A recently bereaved friend has asked her to call him every day, she said. "There's not one person here who allows me to smile," he told her. "I tell him very sick jokes, all about death."

Rivers has never censored her material. "I figure that the people who come to see me know what to expect.

Maybe it's because her routine is so frank, that she can create a cozy atmosphere of shared confidences with a single trademark question: Can We Talk?

While the trappings of Rivers' lifestyle — the limousine, the glamorous clothes — may differ from those of her audience, she insists that "it's a different covering, but inside it's the same piece of chocolate.

Rivers still belongs to New York's Temple Emanu-El, where she and her daughter Melissa were barred from a Yizkor service on the Yom Kippur following Rosenberg's suicide. They had arrived late due to heavy traffic.

"Going [to synagogue] three times a year isn't what [Judaism] is about," Rivers believes. "It's being good every single day, being sensitive to others. Everything is so ethical in the religion. Family is all important."

Festival brings Yiddish culture to Toronto

tures will be Sarah Felder's provocative, poignant and hilarious take on a Jewish lesbian wedding, Jews Bride; Michael Wex and Heiko Lehmann's story theatre project God in Paris; and In The Mother Tongue by Adrienne Cooper, Irena Klepfisz and Joyce Rosenzweig, giving voice to three centuries of women's narrative.

Klezmer aficionados will hear their favorite music fill the air day and night July 7 to 9, in various locales at Harborfront, including the 5,000 seat Molson Place.

There will be craft booths, chotzke emporiums and workshops on Yiddish dance, song and klezmer instrumental techniques, plus public lectures and discussions on topics relating to the Yiddish cultural revival. All events, except those at DuMaurier Theatre and a few special attractions, are free.

Those who want to enjoy nightlife with a Yiddish spice can attend the The Late Night Cabaret of Dreams in the Brigantine Room or Music at the Edge July 7 to 9, both at York Quay.

Travel Talk

by Bill Gladstone

Based in Europe for more than 20 years, American journalist Ruth Ellen Gruber is perhaps best known among North Americans for her 1992 book Jewish Heritage Travel: A Guide to East-Central Europe (John Wiley, revised 1994), which focused on sites where Jews lived and died. She elaborated on her impressions of some of these places in a second volume released last year, Upon the Doorposts of Thy House: Jewish Life in East-Central Europe, Yesterday and Today. Travel Talk recently interviewed Gruber by E-mail between Canada and Italy.

Q: You were posted in Europe for many years before you developed an interest in Jewish heritage sites. What specifically sparked your interest?

A: In September 1989 I went on assignment to Hungary for several Jewish-related stories, including the rededication of the magnificent Great Synagogue in Szeged after its restoration. On the trip, I met up with my brother, Sam Gruber, who had recently become director of the Jewish Heritage Council of the World Monuments Fund. After the Szeged ceremony, we drove around Hungary and into Vojvodina (northern Serbia) to look at (and for) synagogues. In two or three days we saw about a dozen synagogues in various conditions. We were very impressed by them. I realized that I had spent years in Eastern Europe and had had no idea these places existed.

As the revolutions in Eastern Europe began developing, I started traveling more often to the region. In May 1990, I met up with my brother in Poland, and we saw about 34 synagogues in two weeks. Again, it was a revelation. I became deeply interested in these and other Jewish sites, and became committed to documenting them and putting the physical remains of Jewish civilization back on the map.

Q: You recently wrote of your acute uneasiness at taking a Holocaust-related guided tour in Krakow that included genuine Holocaust sites as well as some stage sets from Schindler's List. Can you elaborate?

A: There is a big boom of interest in things Jewish in Central Europe. It's not just in Poland, but in Germany, the Czech Republic, Hungary, even Italy. Jews and things Jewish are fashionable. I do not think that actual Holocaust sites such as Auschwitz, Terezin and the Warsaw Ghetto run the risk of being over-commercialized. But picturesque Jewish quarters in Prague, Krakow and elsewhere are being increasingly exploited for touristic reasons, in ways that sometimes seem crass and not too kosher.

What made me uneasy with the Schindler's List tour was the mixture of fact and fiction, and the blurring of the line between them, as if the film set and scenes somehow were as historically "real" as the actual events that happened.

Q: Why have the Jews ignored the sites of Jewish heritage in postwar Europe until recently?

A: For many, it was too painful to look at. Many Holocaust survivors and their families wanted simply to forget their European experience once they got out. Their ultimate memories and experiences were ones of horror; virtually nothing was left of the Jewish world that had been destroyed in the Shoah. They wanted to create new lives. Europe was, in a sense, cursed.

In addition, the region was under Communist rule. Travel was difficult but, also, the Communist regimes suppressed Jewish and other religious life and had specifically anti-Semitic policies. Maurice Samuel, the essayist and translator, once called Nazism and communism "twin angels of destruction." It made anything to do with Judaism and Jews there difficult. The opening of East-Central Europe after the fall of communism has not only made travel to the region much easier, but it also enabled research into Jewish heritage possible in an open way.

Q: What three or four sites in Poland have left the greatest impression on you?

A: One site that made a big impression on me was the ruins of Rymanow synagogue. I have seen many ruined synagogues, but for some reason this one affected me the most. I don't know why. Maybe the size, the position. The way it looks so lonely and tragic.

Similarly, the ruined cemetery at Karczew, near Warsaw, embodied destruction. Most abandoned Jewish cemeteries are overgrow with weeds. Karczew's toppled stones are drifted over with sand. The "sands of time"? I was also deeply affected by the cemetery in Biala, southern Poland (not Bielska Biala) — beautifully shaped tombstones engulfed in high weeds on a lovely hillside. It was dreamlike, and out of the way. Other extremely impressive sites include the synagogue in Tykocin, which has been restored as a Jewish museum, and Warsaw cemetery — so huge, it's endless. It gives you an idea of the size of what was lost.

PARTY PLANNER

Disc Jockeys will make any party 'happen'

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

The party will "happen" when your guests are entertained by Magic Music and Mitzvah Disc Jockey Entertainment and Planning Group or the Mister Disc Jockey Show..

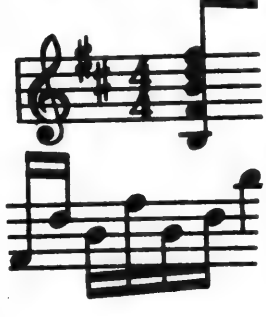
Owned by Stephen Newton Magic Music (733-1100), specializes in quality entertainment geared to every taste and age range.

Newton, who has been a disc jockey for 21 years, says his company is divided into two sections — Magic Music Disc Jockey Services for adult parties and Mitzvah Music Disc Jockey Services which entertains at bar/bat mitzvahs and Sweet 16's."I did this because I feel that youngsters should be entertained by people closer to their age, while adults enjoy a more mature disc jockey."

Two disc jockeys are at every party, one to play the music and the other to emcee. "The emcee really runs the party. He orchestrates the speeches, conducts special songs, gets out on the floor and teaches dance steps — he keeps everything flowing smoothly."

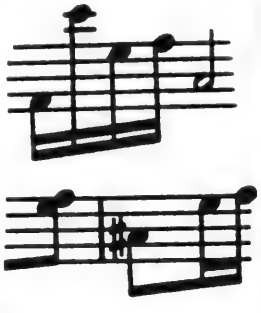
Newton says middle of the road music works best at engagement parties and weddings. "Adults, and even lots of youngsters, love doing the waltzes, cha chas and line dancing.

"Our older disc jockeys grew up in the disco era and our younger disc jockeys know today's dance steps. Together, they know every dance around."



Edwin McCurtry, program director of The Mister Disc Jockey Show (905-886-4488) says disc jockeys are much more than record changers. "There is a gap between record changers and live bands and we fill that gap. We approach every night as a show and we stand out on stage like performers."

He says when he books a show, he interviews the client to determine how formal or informal they would like the show to be.



"We specialize in props and choreography and our performers can dress up like a variety of performers like the Village People, Diana Ross, The Beatles or one of today's bands. We can also bring professional rollerbladers, magicians — any number of professional performers."

"Our shows are done in addition to, not instead of the dance party and we get out there on the dance floor teaching kids all the latest steps. We can teach in groups or as individuals — whatever our client requests. We can also do an interactive video show, which the guests love. We encourage audience participation throughout the party."

Newton says disc jockeys are playing at more and more parties because "bands are getting just too expensive. As well, people like to hear original music as opposed to a band's interpretation." However, Newton recommends having a disc jockey lined up to fill in dead air when a band takes a break.

Newton advises people that before choosing a disc jockey, they should, if possible, go out and hear him. "Otherwise, ask around and get some references. A good reference is a good way to choose."

Consultants fine tune events

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

You've picked the date and chosen the hall but you're not sure what to do next. That is where the services of an experienced party consultant come in.

Lynne Elkind (487-5334), a special event consultant, says a party consultant's job is to offer peace of mind. "I take care of all the major, minor and fine-tuned details that customers do not want to worry about when planning a special occasion. As well, I assist clients in evaluating the most practical and cost effective way of planning their event in order to satisfy their needs and budget.

"Essentially, I cover anything that needs to be done. I will help shop for dresses, choose invitations, pick up a menu — for a flat fee, I'm there from the time my services are engaged, until the party ends."

She says having a party consultant allows the hosts to relax and enjoy their simchah. "The last thing they need is to have to worry about small details. If a guest doesn't have a place to sit, I am able to seat her in a minute. It is a tiny detail, but one that could upset a host if she is trying to attend to too many things at once."

Elkind, whose career snowballed after making a surprise anniversary party for her parents, says theme parties are a large part of her business. "I did a European party in which the invitations, shaped like a flag, were written in three different languages. Guests were introduced to the mood of the party before they arrived."

Risa Gold (905-886-1918), a party consultant for three years, says parties "need a chief to which everyone can turn — someone who will orchestrate a party the way it should be run so the family members can enjoy themselves.

"Before the big day, however, I am also available to make phone calls, accompany them to the caterer, florist, photographer, even the hairdresser. Often, I am the third opinion."

Gold says on the day of the simchah she is there to help the bride get dressed and does not leave until the last professional has left the party. "I go from table to table making sure the guests are happy and I take care of the professionals — get band members or photographers drinks so they can do their job without stopping. I never boss people around but I do orchestrate the whole event, from speeches to serving the meal."

She says one of the biggest challenges faced by any consultant is ensuring there is no problem between estranged families. "I've had divorced parents, who are normally hostile, not only talking but being courteous to each other."

Gold advises people to call at least six months before the simchah so all details can be attended to in plenty of time, but says that she has had clients call at the last minute "because they just didn't realize the vast amount of work it took to make a simchah."

Other party consultants are:

Long hair no longer in vogue

BY SYLVIA PAPERNICK
Special to the CJN

If Lady Godiva were to make her big entrance today, her hair would probably be short.

According to Hair After owner and stylist John Columbo (416-221-6658), current styles dictate that hair past the shoulder is passe.

When it comes to wedding hairstyles, however, Columbo and other top Toronto stylists say the only guideline to follow is making the bride beautiful.

Trained in Italy, Columbo enrolled in the hairstyling course at George Brown College when he came to Canada in 1965. His teachers noticed his skill as a stylist, and he soon found himself instructing. Columbo went on to win a world championship in Tokyo in 1983 with the Canadian hairstyling team.

Together with his staff Columbo can make a bridal party look its best. "You cannot create something that doesn't work as a whole," explains Columbo.

Hair for the bride is very important, and he prefers to consult with the bride about three months before the wedding to decide on a suitable hairstyle for her special day.

In order to have great hair on the day of the wedding, care is required in the months before. The Michael Kluthe Salon (416-925-6306) knows proper hair care is crucial to its clients. As color director Lili Jakel notes, "we make a point of informing our clients as to how to look after their hair, what products to use."

Permanents and coloring can be done with no-ammonia products. The salon specializes in haircoloring for all ages and textures of hair. Semi-permanent colors are used for the more mature hair, to blend the grey in. Jakel says this takes years off a person's appearance. Short hair is very strong this season, with good cuts and strong lines.

Michael Kluthe Salon's work has appeared in many publications including Toronto Life Fashion and Chatelaine. Their expertise in creating dramatic up-dos with full curls, for that romantic evening look, can beautify a bride.

Cathy Rodrigues, owner and senior stylist of Enrico Salon (416-482-8055), believes the total look of the bride must be considered when choosing her hairstyle. "I have to see what the gown is like. First meet a bride, see their personality and hair," she says.

She doesn't want any unwanted surprises to disrupt the day. She specializes in creating a soft look for the bride and can even create the illusion of long hair, where there is none.

Her staff has college training as well as salon experience. Enrico Salon offers hair care for the whole family, as well as manicures and pedicures, and esthetician services.

Another hairdresser is: John Di Bratto Hair Design: (416) 222-4247.

Planners make simchahs fun

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

When party planner Phil Greenspoon says nothing he does is typical, he is not kidding.

His company, Special Events by the Prop House (416-588-7725), creates amazing theme parties — from modest affairs to full-scale extravaganzas attended by thousands of guests.

Recently, for an Aladdin theme party attended by the heads of film studios from around the world, he tented the whole room with black and white fabric. Belly dancers and a fire eater provided the entertainment, while a 6 foot 8 inch actor playing the sultan's guard was the MC.

"That was what I consider to be typical, what you expect to see at one of these functions," said Greenspoon.

He provided a unique twist by covering holes in the centres of the customized tables with colorful turbans. Once the guests were seated, the sultan's guard announced that he wanted everyone to meet their turbans. "We had sat people under the tables," recalled Greenspoon. "They were psychic psychologists, numerologists, fortune tellers and tarot card readers." Throughout the evening, they told fortunes at the tables.

He has carried the idea of the live centrepiece into other themes. At a music theme party for a bar mitzvah, he used musicians and singers as centrepieces; for another bar mitzvah, a comedian who told jokes to the guests was in the centre of the place-card table.

There is a choice of more than 50 themes, said Greenspoon. "Each theme is very well developed, so basically you can pick and choose the components to fit just about any budget."

He is available to take care of all aspects of special-event planning. However, he will do as much or as little of the planning as the host wishes. Some people request decor only, he said.

If he does plan an event, Greenspoon takes a load off the host's shoulders. "Instead of looking at 10 different florists and checking different catering and looking at all the venues, we'll do all the groundwork and go to them with a package that can be modified," he said, adding that each package comes with a written quote. He passes the discounts he receives from party professionals on to his clients.

For Sari Gorman of Gorman/McIlveen and Associates (416-322-3212), it is critical that hosts enjoy the party she and her partner plan for them. "Then we know we've had a successful party," she said.

Gorman, who has a diverse background that includes organizing corporate media events, and her partner Iain McIlveen have been making special events truly special for a combined total of more than 30 years.

The two of them are available to plan events of any size, from birthday parties for four to a charity ball or even a business convention for thousands of guests.

"We do the worrying," she said, "so the hosts can enjoy themselves."

She and her partner will personally oversee all aspects, or single aspects, of the planning. "We're not a referral service," said Gorman.

The stage designer for Roy Thomson Hall's Unique Lives and Experiences series, she takes care of any design work herself, including floral design. "Floral design," she said, "is one of my passions."

Any staff employed by the company are "highly trained," she said, and expectations are tremendous.

McIlveen, a French-trained chef with 10 years experience in kosher catering handles menu design.

The firm has an in-house consultant, Wendy Zinner, who is familiar with all the dos and don'ts of wedding etiquette, including the customs of very religious Orthodox marriages.

"She has worked with many rabbis in the city, so there are no mistakes made," said Gorman.

Getting your just desserts

BY RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to the CJN

A sumptuous table laid out by Sweet Yorks.

Our world may be changing at a dizzying pace, driven by the hi-tech revolution, but luckily kosher desserts — mouth watering tortes, mousse cakes and fruit flans made by this city's superb bakers — are immune to change.

"There isn't very much that's new in baking, just twists and turns of the same old varieties," said Israel Maierovits of Hermes Bakery (416-787-1234).

Maierovits ought to know about baking. His Romanian-born father, Herman, opened the original Hermes on St. Clair West in 1951. Since then, the bakery has been supplying kosher caterers with parve desserts that are sure to have guests at any simchah wanting seconds. Currently there are three Hermes locations, two on Bathurst Street and one on Sheppard Avenue.

Maierovits brought out two beautifully decorated cakes from the freezer — orange and lemon mousse — for a taste test. They are delicious, creamy tasting and, of course, parve.

Hermes has a large selection of classic tortes that are perfect for parties. They include the thalhoff torte, layers of nut cake sandwiched with a chocolate fondant filling and coated with chocolate, and the imperial coffee torte, a stunning addition to any dessert table with its edible crown.

Flans, either strawberry or mixed fruit, are a favorite with hosts as are trays of miniature petit fours, fruit tarts and danishes, Maierovits said. The bakery also prepares trays of almond florentines, nut horns and sandwich cookies.

Cakes, including wedding and bar and bat mitzvah cakes in either traditional or contemporary designs, can be made in chocolate or other flavors. Traditional Jewish themes and sports themes, such as baseball, are popular for bar and bat mitzvah cakes, he said.

Hermes uses fresh, all-natural ingredients, he stressed. "We cook our own fruit fillings for pies and grind our own nuts to have them fresh."

Sharon Firestone, who operates Sweet York Desserts (416-782-1798) out of Beth Tzedec Congregation with her partner Bill Batista, said "our cakes look really nice and, more importantly, they taste really good."

They bake a full assortment of cakes, tortes, flans, pastries and cookies, all kosher and parve, for caterers, hotels and individuals throughout the city. Only fresh ingredients are used, and the tempting cakes are decorated with fruit.

Simchah hosts can select from a dozen varieties of tortes and flans. The heavenly chocolate mousse torte — chocolate cake and mousse glazed with dark chocolate and decorated with chocolate-dipped fruit — will certainly appeal to chocolate lovers. Their banana torte, with three layers of banana/walnut cake filled with banana cream and decorated with glazed, sliced bananas and nuts, is a sweet inspiration.

There are eight types of pastries to choose from and six kinds of cookies, everything from rocky road squares to baklava to biscotti.

Sweet York Desserts makes custom-designed wedding and bar and bat mitzvah cakes in a variety of flavors, including chocolate, carrot and banana. Firestone meets clients ahead of time to plan their simchah cakes. The bakery can work form a photograph or from detailed instructions.

Firestone has some talented designers working for her, including Linda Thomas, who specializes in creating artfully decorated cakes with fondant.

Kosher caterers provide value & elegance

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

Healthy and elegant, with value for the dollar — those are the trends in kosher catering today. And L'Chaim Caterers, Regal Kosher Caterers and Firestone Caterers go all out to keep in step.

Firestone, exclusive caterer to Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, has been in the business the longest — over 30 years, says manager of catering operations Les Firestone. (His father, Sam, is still the president.)

The three banquet halls can serve from 50 to 500 people with space for dancing, and more for such events as sports banquets.

Les Firestone says the facilities are constantly being refurbished and updated, as is the menu.

"We are always looking for new and innovative ideas," such as their international menu, which might include sesame seared salmon, grilled wingbone breast of chicken with hoisin glaze and mango and apricot salsa, or oriental beggar's purses, a pouch of vegetables tied with a leek.

They even offer exotic pizzas.

People want healthier, trendier menus; so Firestone looks for recipes with olive oils, herbs, garlic and exotic vinegars.

One major change he has especially noticed in weddings, he says, is that plans are not just made by the mother of the bride.

"The bride and groom, and the groom's side are involved too."

In order to accommodate today's busy lifestyles, caterers arrange to see clients after work or Sundays — whenever it is convenient for them.

Like Regal and L'Chaim, Firestone also does sports banquets, business and corporate functions, awards dinners and Sheva Brachot.

Joanne Kates, catering manager of Regal Kosher Caterers is also conscious of the new trends.

"People want to make their simchah as warm and wonderful and elegant as they can — within the limits of their budget," she says.

Regal offers the facilities of three banquet halls at the Montecassino Hotel at Sheppard and Chesswood. Two of the rooms hold up to 350 people (with dancing facilities), while the third holds up to 150. The walls between the rooms can be opened to accomodate larger groups.

Some people, Kates said, use the smaller room for the chupah ("we set it up auditorium style") and the bigger one for the dinner.

Regal also operates King Solomon's Table, a fine dining restaurant, also at Montecassino Hotel. This can be used for small parties or Sheva Brachot, for instance.

Or, she suggests, when the restaurant is closed (Friday, Saturday nights in the winter and early Sundays), customers can use that facility then for their event.

Chinese food is the specialty of this caterer — sesame yams and lemon chicken are just two of the well-known offerings — but "you name the continent, and we can do their cuisine," Kates promises.

She has found their station menu especially popular, where each place has a different kind of food.

L'Chaim, which caters in private homes and various private banquet halls, can serve both very small and larger functions.

Business and corporate catering plays a large role in their activities, says manager Jack Ponte. "A company might be doing a presentation for their customers, and wants to serve hors-d'oeuvre, or a company might want to serve a luncheon."

Their customers know, he says, that "we cook for them, not for a thousand people. Everything is 100 per cent fresh, made from scratch, with no additives or mixes."

The Ponte family is from Morocco, and L'Chaim specializes in Middle Eastern food. Couscous is "one of our hotter items, he says, made into a salad, loaded with fresh mint and chopped tomatoes, or made with fruits or squash.

This is in line with today's health conscious consumer, Ponte says, who doesn't want as much red meat.

Like Regal and Firestone, L'Chaim is happy to recommend a florist, photographer, or anyone else needed to make the simchah special, and to advise on the perfect menu.

All three are under the supervision of the Kashruth Council of Toronto.

Gowns leave lasting impression

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

There are many emotionally charged moments in a wedding ceremony, but the most dramatic moment comes when the bride enters the room.

Everybody wants to see how she looks — her hair, her makeup. But it's the dress, the bridal gown, people are most curious about, as they strain to catch a glimse of the bride.

Brides are under a lot of pressure to find the perfect wedding gown because they're scrutinized closely. Buying the dress is a major decision and a major investment. That's why it's important to go to a bridal salon that offers both quality products and service.

L & J Bridal (50 Queen St. in Brampton) prides itself on service, says manager Joanne Filosa. Her mother, Angela Schirippa started the company 20 years ago; today L & J Bridal is the largest bridal shop in Canada, Filosa says.

Three floors with over 9,000 square feet of retail space provide everything the bride and the mothers of the bride and groom will need, she said.

Filosa described the store as mid-priced to high-end, with bridal gowns ranging from $1,000 to $9,000. She said on average, brides spend between $1,500 and $3,000 to be completely outfitted with gown, veil, headpiece and cloth shoes.

Silk, tulle and lace are very strong this year, Filosa said.

Centrepieces add to the fun

By SYLVIA PAPERNICK
Special to The CJN

Unusual centrepieces and party favors can add to the enjoyment of your party and make it memorable.

Almost everybody likes chocolate and Chocolate Charm owner Bob Levine has been supplying party favors of the finest Belgian and Swiss chocolate for Toronto simchahs for 12 years.

For a bar or bat mitzvah he may provide chocolate lollipops personalized with the child's name to be distributed to departing guests. Chocolate moulds are made up to represent the child's interest, from computers or baseball to dance. Smashable cakes are available, with a mallet supplied so the "star" of the evening can break up the cake before it is served.

For weddings, one- and two-truffle boxes, imprinted with the couple's initials or names and the wedding date, are decorated in a variety of colors. Chocolate filled baskets, truffles and chocolate cups ready to fill are a wonderful addition to dessert.

An extra special something at a bridal shower is offering each guest a chocolate rose individually wrapped in a white dot bag with a ribbon to match the party decor. For more information, call Chocolate Charm at (416-787-4256).

Flowers with Flare owner Cheryl Bernknopf (416-498-8205) creates arrangements that are fresh in every way.

"Everybody wants something different, new and exciting," says Bernknopf, and her staff is always able to deliver. Centrepieces may feature flowers on a pedestal draped down the side or helium balloons with bears, imprinted with "From the bar mitzvah of ..." With deliveries four times a week, her flowers are always fresh.

Bernknopf can match any color scheme, dyeing or spray painting if necessary. One inventive centrepiece request had her create a different storybook theme for each table, working with the characters of the story.

The Happy Days party specialists work to ensure that party memories will be just that. Owner Richard Winkler has created centrepieces, decorations, party themes and favors for all types of celebrations, including weddings, bar and bat mitzvot, showers and sweet 16s.

He says balloons are becoming more popular lately, especially for weddings, where they can enhance the room with balloon bouquets, arches or sculptures.

No job is too big or too small. Happy Days has decorated for functions in Casa Loma and the Skydome, as well as in people's basements.

Party favors are personalized and are reasonably priced from $2 to $12. They range from boxer shorts, hats and key chains to custom imprinted mugs, gumball machines and socks. All edible items are approved under the Kashruth Council of Toronto.

After an initial meeting with the client, Winkler has a sample centrepiece made up, working with one of his designers.

"We're constantly coming up with new ideas and themes; we've never been stumped," Winkler says.

Custom made sign-in boards, laminated and illuminated, and arranging candle lighting ceremonies are two other Happy Days specialties. Snow cone, popcorn, miniature doughnut and candy floss machines are also available for party rentals.

Happy Days is located at 248 Steeles Avenue West, in the Toys 'R Us Plaza, 416-789-GIFT(4438).

Beautiful dresses leave lasting impression

[Cont'd. from page B8]

"That's really a change. It used to be all satin."

Some American designers such as Eve Milady are showing less elaborate gowns. The bodice has the detail (beading and sequins), while the gown is simpler. Off-the-shoulder and sweetheart neckline are very popular, she added.

For headpieces, brides are choosing tiaras, which go well with traditional gowns, and beaded hairbands with a veil attached for the simpler dresses, Filosa said. Veil and headpiece packages cost between $225 and $575.

Outfits for mothers cost $525 to $4,000. "Mothers are very important to us," Filosa said. "We have a whole floor for mothers."

They don't have to wear the same colors as bridesmaids, she said, explaining that ivory and black with gold are the biggest selling colors for mothers.

For weddings with more than 150 guests, she recommends mothers wear gowns rather than cocktail suits. Filosa said mothers should not have any difficulty finding flattering gowns.

"A lot of gowns today camouflage flaws in the figure." Allen J. can also special order outfits when necessary.

Mothers and bridesmaids looking for something special should go to Betty Kastenberg, phone a better womenswear shop in the plaza on the southeast corner of Bathurst and Steeles in North York.

"We do the wedding parties, mothers of the bride and groom, showers and luncheons, as well as other simchas," Kastenberg said "We see families from the beginning when they need something for the engagement party right through to the wedding."

Cocktail suits with rhinestones are popular this year, as are slip dresses for young girls, but palazzo pants for evening wear are out, said Sharon Kaufman, Kastenberg's daughter.

Kaufman has been working with her mother since the store opened 26 years ago.

She said lace and chiffon are big sellers this summer, while outfits with sequins and heavy beading tend to be more popular in the winter. The cocktail suit is very versatile but is generally worn by the mothers for afternoon weddings; gowns for the mothers of the bride and groom are the trend for evenings, she said.

It has become more common for bridesmaids to choose their own style dress once the color scheme for the wedding has been selected, she said.

"It used to be they (the bridesmaids) all wore the same style. But now they wear whatever suits them."

Betty Kastenberg carries styles to flatter every figure, Kaufman said. She recommended suits with longer jackets for women who are bottom-heavy and long sleeve gowns with fitted beaded bodice and chiffon skirts for fuller figured women.

"The chiffon falls close to the body and is very flattering," she said.

Betty Kastenberg does a lot of special orders and there is an alterationist on hand six days a week.

The store also caters to the needs of more religious women; if the fabric is sheer the store has it lined and there are special orders for longer skirts, she said.

"We tailor clothing to fit customer's needs."

All the women in the wedding party can be fully outfitted at the Bay Bridal Salon in the flagship store at Queen and Yonge streets. The salon also carries a full line of bridal accessories.

Ethos Bridal Group, a bridal-wear company in business for more than 25 years, has been operating six bridal shops in several Bay Stores across Canada — five in Calgary and British Columbia, and one in Ontario — since 1993. Ethos also has additional bridal stores out west.

Ethos is both the manufacturer and retailer of the garments — the dresses are manufactured in the Far East — owner Chaim Homberg said. The philosophy of the Ethos Bridal Group is tied in with that of the Bay where the emphasis is on value, he said. "Value is very important. We give better prices and superior service."

Most wedding gowns cost between $400 and $900, bridesmaids dresses and mothers' outfits are $150 to $250 and $180 to $300, respectively Homberg said, adding that he also carries a nice selection of designer gowns. Customers can also have items by special order.

The bridal gowns, all handmade, come in a variety of fabrics — silk, taffeta, chiffon, organza, satin and lace. According to Homberg, silk is popular this year both for the simpler gowns and the traditional ones.

Bridal wear is as seasonal as other lines of clothing, Homberg said. "You can order dark and light colors all year round." For bridesmaid dresses, dark colors like royal blue, black, burgundy and purple are the trend.

Books can make cooking a treat

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

Cooking shouldn't be boring, not in an age when so many fresh ingredients and exotic spices are readily available.

And if you have access to the following new and creative cookbooks, you will enrich your culinary expertise:

•The Kosher Gourmet (Random House, $17.50) proves yet again that the sky is practically the limit when it comes to kosher food.

Editors Batia Plotch and Patricia Cobe have assembled more than 200 recipes from around the world to please any palate.

They range from the pedestrian (chicken paprikas) to the sublime (roasted peppers with anchovies and olives). This is a book well worth keeping within arm's reach.

•Mediterranean Cooking (HarperCollins, $24.50) by Paula Wolfert is an excellent paean to the wonders of this variegated cuisine.

In recent years, scientists and dieticians alike have belatedly reached the conclusion that the Mediterranean table, which relies heavily on green vegetables, grains, beans, lentils and fruits, is actually good for your health.

In addition, the food of this region is incredibly tantalizing. To wit: leg of lamb with garlic sauce from France, vegetable ragout from Tunisia, Tangier couscous from Morocco, fried stuffed olives from Italy and Andulusian garlic and bread soup from Spain.

Wolfert, the acknowledged

Setting the musical tone

By SYLVIA PAPERNICK
Special to The CJN

A band sets the tone for a successful party. Two bands capable of providing a simchah with total musical entertainment are Murray Alter's The Future Sounds and The Shelly Ovdat Band.

The Future Sounds draws on Alter's 40 years of experience in the business, providing customized sounds. Planning begins once Alter has the initial consultation with the clients. He is then able to accommodate their needs and tastes.

The band has a large repertoire of Latin, ethnic, modern and big band sounds that span different periods and offer something for everyone. The band size can vary depending on the affair, and the desire of the hosts. Duos and trios are available, as are larger groups.

When asked, The Future Sounds will learn a wedding song unique to the newlyweds. The band has had such vocalists as Vivian Williams, Jackie Richardson and Arlene Duncan through many weddings, bar and bat mitzvahs and corporate functions.

The Future Sounds has a style of its own. "It seems everyone [other bands] is saying the same thing, but is everyone doing the same thing?" Alter asked. Obviously, The Future Sounds is doing something right. Contact Murray Alter's Talent Associates Ltd. at (416-782-3931).

Shelly Ovdat

The Shelley Ovdat Band (905-881-9949), takes its cue from lead singer Ovdat, whose clear voice and sparkling personality lend a touch of the exotic to any occasion. The Israeli-born singer brings a Jewish spirituality to her music, singing in Hebrew, English, Spanish, Yiddish and Russian.

Ovdat also brings her background as an international performer to her work in Toronto. It includes a busy career in Israel where she recorded many different albums for children and adults. She sang for the Israel Ministry of Tourism and with the Entertainment Corps of the Israeli army. A highlight of her career came when she was selected from 300 singers to represent Israel in an international song festival in Chile.

Singing songs of Israel, both traditional and contemporary, Ovdat feels she can "bring the spirit of Jerusalem to your heart." She has the ability to involve a crowd, sharing the warmth of her music.

Whether she is performing ballads or horas, people inevitaby clap along and enjoy themselves. She is as comfortable performing in a large hall as in the intimacy of a private home for an engagement or anniversary party.

Unlike other groups, The Shelly Ovdat band does not charge an hourly rate. If the party is going strong and their previously booked time is up, they stay on if people are having a good time.

One of Murray Alter's favorite vocalists is "Lori."

Tents and candy machines to rent

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

From dishes, cutlery, chairs, tables and table coverings to a tent complete with a dance floor, rental companies are there to supply hosts with anything they need for their party.

David Silverman, who owns D & D Party Rentals with his wife Dorice (665-9570), says their firm can supply everything for a party but the food.

"What we do is go to the home and discuss a client's needs. We specialize in working within a budget, so if one type of china is not within their means, we can substitute another that looks as nice but costs less. We even have a big selection of glass dishes and about 6,000 settings of cutlery so we are able to please everyone.

"All dishes come wrapped in sets of five and come right out of the dishwasher so they are sparkling clean. When done, all hosts need to do is rinse and scrape. It saves a lot of time and bother."

Silverman says that backyard tents have become a popular venue for parties and D & D has a tent to suit most size parties or yards. They range in size to fit from 10 to about 400 people and are framed rather than set up with poles so there are no inside obstructions.

"If a dance floor is needed, we can set one up in the tent or in a carpeted living room or basement. We can put down a dance floor to fit up to 144 couples."

John Vanderhart, owner of Varsity Tents (410-7370), rents vinyl tents because canvas tents leak and are hard to keep clean. "Safety is an important factor when putting up a tent and we always take the time to ensure that they are installed properly. We use a swivel anchor which twirls and untwirls so not only is the tent anchored securely, there is no damage to the lawn."

He says people rent tents either as an overflow if the house is too small or if they want the entire party outdoors. "A tent gives a festive air to a party. We can put up chandeliers or ceiling fans and they can be decorated in a variety of ways. We can put down carpeting or flooring, but most people prefer the bare lawn. If it calls for rain, we can put the tent up early so the lawn underneath has a chance to dry."

Are all tents the same? "Not at all," says Vanderhart. "We have a tent for everyone, from small to large and in a variety of shapes. We can rent out a clear topped tent or an Arabian tent with a high peak — whatever tickles the client's fancy. We give an on-sight consultation and review all options."

To add a little fun to a party at any venue, hosts may want to call The Candy Man (789-7173), who rents kosher sno-cone, candy floss or mini-doughnut machines. "We have our machines at bar mitzvahs, sweet 16s, graduation parties — anywhere where there are young people," says owner Jack Schnoll.

He says that the mini-doughnuts, which are made on the spot and come in a variety of eight flavored toppings, are a hit with kids and adults and are a great alternative to the sweet table. "We provide unlimited amounts of doughnuts and because we cook upon demand, there is no waste."

The Candy Man also does candy centrepieces, a candy sweet table and has an in-house consultant who can help with any party rentals or decorations needed.

Values brought to mitzvahs

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

Putting the mitzvah'' back into bar and bat mitzvah is one goal of a new family-oriented pre-bar and bat mitzvah program instituted earlier this year at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation.

The program is a collaborative effort of four synagogue staff members: Rabbi Philip Scheim; Debbie Dash, director of programming and outreach; Shirley Vernon, executive director; and Lorne Hanick, ritual director.

''Often there is a major party and very little Judaic component, [with] even less sense of mitzvah,'' said the rabbi. ''Themes of hockey, even cartoon characters, become the focus. We want to counter that on at least two fronts.''

The program's dual focus comprises a volunteer project for each child, as well as a series of six monthly family meetings, each addressing a different Jewish value.

The volunteer project puts into action the Jewish value of gemilut chassadim (acts of loving kindness).

''I want this to be viewed as something that adds to the significance of the year,'' said Rabbi Scheim.

Such enhancement programs are not a new idea. Temple Emanu-El was a local pioneer in the field, when it instituted a pre-bar and bat mitzvah program about 20 years ago. As part of the Reform temple's program, students keep a diary of their volunteer experience.

In recent years, an increasing number of synagogues have looked for creative ways of enriching the bar/bat mitzvah year.

''[The celebrants] are entering a stage in life that's very exciting Jewishly, not just socially,'' said Rabbi Scheim.

Programs a growing trend

At a growing number of Toronto-area synagogues, youngsters preparing for bar and bat mitzvah ceremonies are also gaining experience in translating Jewish values into everyday life.

Mandatory programs that call for fulfilling specific mitzvot appear to constitute a growing trend across the spectrum of Jewish observance.

At Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto, an Orthodox congregation in Thornhill, pre-bat mitzvah girls take part in a mandatory Chessed project, such as delivering packages to needy families. A similar program for boys is being discussed.

At Shaar Shalom, a Conservative congregation, celebrants are required to donate to a tzedakah (charity) that they have researched — one that they find meaningful — and to write an essay about the tzedakah.

Beth Shalom, also Conservative, is phasing in a series of requirement for its b'nai mitzvah. Currently youngsters are introduced to opportunities for volunteerism, but it is not yet mandatory.

A number of other synagogues also have programs encouraging youngsters to put their Jewish values to work in the greater community.

Flowers brighten anyone's simchah

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

Take an empty room, add some flowers and greens and instantly it is transformed into an elegant, festive hall, suitable for any party.

Mary Drago, a floral designer at Jazzy Bloom (416-636-4441) says flowers are so versatile they ''say whatever you want. If you want bright, festive, formal, casual — whatever mood you want to portray, there are the right flowers.''

She says at most wedding ceremonies, brides choose flowers to enhance the color scheme of the wedding procession. ''If attendants are wearing purple, we can decorate with pink or off white flowers. At the reception, we choose flowers that will blend with the color scheme of the table coverings and other decorations. Flowers add that little something extra that other decorations just cannot.''

She stresses flowers can decorate a room beautifully on any budget. ''We can use lower cost roses and we can even work with carnations, daisies and fillers such as greens and baby's breath to transform a room into a party room that looks great. Place a few daisies in a thin glass vase, sit it in the centre of each table and you've got an elegant centrepiece at a low price. There is just no end to what a floral designer can do with flowers.''

Those with more room in their budget for flowers can opt for more exotic, imported blooms from places such as Hawaii or the Caribbean. ''Birds of paradise, ginger, halaconia, portea, antherium are all very bright and can turn a room into an island paradise.

''A middle-of-the-road budget can handle such flowers as tulips and lilies, which are locally grown in the spring or imported in the winter. Whatever we use, however, we can make a room great. That is the beauty of flowers, a tiny bit says a lot.''

Drago says those who want to retain their bouquets as a lasting memory of their wedding can speak to their florists about having them preserved. ''They stay forever and they are a treasure, not unlike a favorite photograph.''

Imaginative decor creates worlds of color and light

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

When the bride and groom walked through the entrance-way of the hall, two fireworks fountains appeared on either side of them; later, as the couple kissed, they were framed by a silver fireworks archway.

"It's quite a dramatic display," said Mark Fine, president of Airmagic Pyrotechnics and Special Effects (416-703-0425), the magician who has created such effects at several weddings.

The creator of innovative indoor and outdoor fireworks and special effects for all occasions, Fine has brought his show to simchahs, convention centres, hotel ballrooms, backyards — and even Parliament Hill for Canada Day in 1993.

At bar and bat mitzvahs, during the hora, he has showered the hosts and guests with multicolored streamers that explode from cartridges.

"Each cartridge goes off with a loud bang, and it shoots 75 18-inch streamers," he said. "We fire them off a few at a time — when the bar mitzvah boy is sitting on the chair on the guests' shoulders and when the mum and dad are up on the chair and at the end of the hora.

For weddings, the streamer shower is used during the first dance, in combination with a silver or gold air burst. An air burst is similar to the special effect used at Blue Jays games to signify a home run.

"It looks like a big ball of fireworks hanging from the ceiling when it explodes," said Fine. Air bursts are usually reserved for candlelighting at bar or bat mitzvahs.

He has done fireworks waterfalls from ceilings and created subtemp fireworks fountains that he calls dreamstars. "We'll do those on the table behind the cake when the boy or girl lights the candles," he said.

An olfactory effect Fine offers is his air ambience system — he fills a room with a scent, perhaps the fragrance of roses or violets, for an entire event or at a specific time.

When the outdoor party season begins, he gets requests for low level aerial fireworks displays and fireworks signs. "We can scale it to fit any size area, whether it's a park, a resort or a backyard," Fine said.

Stressing that the indoor and outdoor fireworks products he uses are federally approved, he said the company is fully insured and has a perfect safety record."

Karen Baker Designs Photo supplied by Arnold Machtinger

Karen Baker of Designs by Karen Baker (905-886-8100) offers some fabulous theme packages for simchahs, including Caribbean, Medieval, beach, garden and underwater themes.

Baker is the talented designer who created a tour of the Mississippi setting for the opening night of Show Boat at the Ford Centre for the Performing Arts in North York. She will be doing the design work for the opening of Sunset Boulevard this fall.

For simchahs, she designs invitations and centrepieces, helps to select linen, places table decor, arranges flowers and, if necessary, covers the walls and ceilings of the hall with decorative fabric or other materials.

"We've either covered or replaced chairs in the banquet room to create a more interesting setting," said Baker.

An expert floral designer, she provides the flowers from her own shop and designs the containers herself. For children's tables, she creates containers and props in various shapes out of styrofoam.

Baker does sample room setups for hosts in advance, so they can see exactly what they are getting. "They don't have to worry about it," she said.

Decor, she said, need not be expensive as a lot can be done by using color and imagination.

Lina D'Angela of Party Toons (905-669-4778) is a creative decorator who transforms ordinary rooms into fabulous theme party environments with the help of balloons, styrofoam and shiny Mylar.

She has designed sports, dance, music, clown, acrobat and tropical themes, including the floral arrangements, and is available for all special occasions.

For a recent bar mitzvah, she made centrepieces from silhouettes of hockey players that she had cut out of styrofoam. Once the figures were painted, covered with glitter and inserted into bases, she added balloons and Mylar as finishing touches.

Cutouts of masks from The Phantom of the Opera were the centrepieces for another of her parties. Brightly painted and decorated cutouts of different types of fish were highlighted in her tropical theme, and for a music theme bat mitzvah she used cutouts of saxophones as centrepieces, because the bar mitzvah boy plays the instrument. A recent starry night theme featured regular star-shaped balloons as well as Mylar balloons, and she created special lighting effects.

Balloon sculptures, including colorful balloon trees suspended from the ceiling, free-standing balloon trees and balloon signs are one of her specialties. "It's amazing what you can do with balloons," said D'Angela.

Local bands full of great talent

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

Toronto's bands are made up of talented musicians and vocalists who provide world-class entertainment at simchahs and irresistible dance music to get your guests out of their seats and onto the floor.

Aelita and Friends (416-222-7573), regulars on the simchah circuit, have toured around the world, covering three continents in their travels. They have performed their repertoire of 14 revues, ranging from The Best of Broadway to Jerusalem of Gold, in England, Australia, Singapore, Taiwan, Mexico and the United States.

Sounds as if it would cost a bundle to hire them for a simchah, but that's not the case, according to vocalist Aelita Neihausen.

"We fit any budget," she said. "We are very competitive and reasonable for the services we provide."

Aelita and Friends can be an entourage of 16, which may include comedians, jugglers and dancers; or as small as a group of three — Aelita along with two musicians. If the band is small, "each member doubles on two or three instruments and is a lead singer as well," said Aelita.

Among the floor shows offered by the group, there are fabulous '50s, Cotton Club (1920s), Dick Tracy (1930s), swing is here to stay (1940s) and Hollywood themes.

Aelita meets with hosts several times before an event to discuss their musical tastes and find out what type of atmosphere they wish to create. "I become familiar with the guests' musical backgrounds and musical preferences so no one is left out," she said.

Aelita and Friends have a repertoire of 2,000 songs, including klezmer, traditional Israeli music, standards, jazz and hit tunes from the 1950s to the 1990s.

Disco is back, and Latin music is much bigger than it was five years ago, said Aelita. Children enjoy tunes from the Walt Disney productions The Lion King, Beauty and the Beast and Aladdin, as well as popular music.

It's the music that makes a simchah memorable for guests, said band leader Harvey Seigel (416-782-9202). "They will remember the party if they had a wonderful time, and that will only be due to the quality of the band and the musicians."

Seigel is the leader of three memorable bands. The Fabulous

Harvey Seigel

Harvey Seigel Band has been performing at weddings, bar and bat mitzvahs, corporate events, fundraisers and music festivals for the past 26 years. His Speak-Easy Jazz Band, which specializes in New Orleans and Chicago jazz has played at numerous jazz festivals for the last 10 years. And he formed Harvey Seigel's All-Stars Jazz Band four years ago because there was such a demand for jazz standards and classics, particularly the music of great American composers such as George Gershwin, Cole Porter and Duke Ellington.

Versatility is one of the keys to the success of the three bands, said Seigel. They have a diverse repertoire, including cha-chas, bossa novas, polkas, show tunes, Dixieland, swing, jazz standards, klezmer, Israeli music, '50s rock'n roll and contemporary hits.

His bands can be made up of anywhere from 3 to 16 professional musicians, including male and female vocalists.

Some of his clients pick music in advance, but they do not always anticipate the crowd's taste, Seigel said. From his vantage point on stage — he is a vocalist who plays trombone, congo drums and harmonica — he "tests the waters and watches what motivates a crowd."

If the crowd seems unenthusiastic about the music the band is playing and he is getting requests for other types of music he will change musical direction after getting the host's okay.

The Nu-Rhythm Band, led by Isaac Oziel (905-882-5044), is one of the hottest dance bands in town.

Known for its versatility, the band plays music from 1950s right up to contemporary hits of the 1990s.

"We customize our musical program to suit the crowd," said Oziel. "If you come to hear us perform every week, chances are you'll hear a different program each time. Every party is different and we pride ourselves on pleasing every client."

Although Nu-Rhythm's standard group is made up of eight members, including musicians and vocalists, the band size can be adjusted to the host's requirements.

"Our aim is to make your simchah the best party in town," he said.

Lingerie lets you be comfortable

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Proper undergarments can enhance the look and fit of a bridal gown, says June Taylor, owner of the Bra Bar, which has stores on Yorkville Avenue and on Avenue Road.

Brides often wear bustiers, long-lined strapless bras with low backs for decollete gowns. According to Tayor, women with small and average-sized breasts don't have to worry about proper support when they wear bustiers, but it's more difficult to support heavier breasts with this kind of bra.

She says women with C cups and larger should shop for their undergarments before choosing their wedding gowns.

"There's no point getting all excited about a wedding dress if you can't get the proper support. If you're 34B life's easy ... with CC and DD cups you have to think ahead."

Women with very heavy breasts cannot go strapless, she says. "You have to face reality ... It's a tough deal."

The Bra Bar carries bras from 30A to 52DDD. Bustiers are available up to size 44 and start at $45. The store has one of the largest selections of bras in the city and can serve women who are hard to fit, Taylor says. "If anyone is not the easiest to fit, 99.9 per cent of the time we can fit them."

Taylor says she started the business 23 years ago because she couldn't find bras to fit her in Canada. While the Bra Bar specializes in bras of all sizes and prices, it also carries other lingerie items such as garters, panties, camisoles, girdles, body suits, half slips and bridal stockings.

Kathryn's, a lingerie store at 1763 Avenue Rd., just north of Lawrence, sells both undergarments and elegant sleepware. The store carries one-piece bras such as bustiers in a variety of sizes ranging in price from $69 to $169.

"The price depends on whether it's French-made or made in Canada," says Susan Klein, a co-owner of the store.

Kathryn's stocks a number of items used by brides, including strapless bras, fancy garters, bridal stockings, lace underwear, slips, camisoles and elegant and sexy sleepwear for the honeymoon.

Brides prefer to wear garters and stockings instead of panty hose because they're cooler, especially in the summer, Klein says. She carries lace top stockings that can be worn with or without garters.

Kathryn's offers a large selection of nightgowns, negligees, pyjamas and other boudoir wear geared to every budget. Pure silk nightgowns start at $65. Teddies (one piece camisoles and panties) have become increasingly popular for honeymoons, but peignoirs, two-piece kimono and nightgown sets, are the more traditional choice, she says.

The peignoir sets come in various lengths, styles and materials: chiffon, silk, satins; with sleeves or sleeveless; and slip style, gathered at the waist, or loose and flowing. The bodice can be beaded with pearls and rhinestones and/or trimmed with different kinds of lace.

White and peach are the colors most often choosen for the honeymoon, Klein says, adding that black is the color men tend to choose when they buy birthday, anniversary, holiday or Valentine's Day gifts. "Men like black. That's what they think is sexy," she says.

"Men come in shy. They go out happy we helped them. I try to make them very comfortable."

She stresses that Kathryn's does not sell sleazy lingerie. "This is classy lingerie, not a fun store. We sell sexy but classy luxury items. And it's not that expensive."

Books make cooking fun

maven of North African fare, has produced a first-rate book.

•Middle Eastern Cooking (Prion, $29) by Christine Osborne is a beautifully illustrated volume containing over 100 delicious recipes.

Osborne, a British writer, gives you the lowdown on mezzes (appetizers), soups, salads, vegetables and rice, seafood, meat poultry, desserts and drinks.

This is a book you'll return to time and time again.

An Australian home economics teacher, Leng lists some 750 recipes, demonstrating that a little imagination can go a long way.

This may be the ultimate veggie book.

•Classic Chinese Cuisine (Firefly Books, $19.95) by Nina Simmonds promises a lot. The author claims she can turn a person with even modest cooking ability into an instant expert who'll make diners rave.

Before getting down to the business of recipes, Simmonds discusses the regions of China and their flavors, special ingredients, cooking methods and equipment.

Having dispensed with the basics, she plunges into the aromatic and mouth-watering task of converting the ingredients into memorable meals.

•Classic Home Desserts (Firefly Books, $29.95) by Richard Sax may well be the last word on this sweet topic.

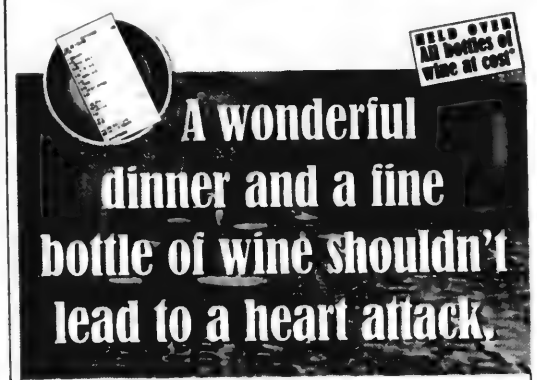
In 668 pages with 48 full-color pictures, Sax explores a universe which appeals to old and young, rich and poor.

With this volume at hand, you may forget your favorite bakery.

•Mrs. Fields I Love Chocolate Book! (Fitzhenry & Whiteside, $16.95) will thrill chocolate lovers.

Debbie Fields, who obviously knows her subject inside out, presents a primer on cookies, bars, cakes, pies, pastries, puddings, mousses, souffles, ice cream, frozen desserts, candies, decorations and what she refers to as showstoppers.

An irresistible book.



The food's to die for, not the bill. Homemade thin crust pizzas, inspired pastas, fresh fish and innovative dishes from our grill. All carefully prepared with market fresh ingredients for a difference you can taste. And our piece de la resistance – two can enjoy appetizers, entrées and a fine bottle of wine from $40, tax included.

YOUtv

No, this isn't the monolith from 2001: A Space Odyssey.

You've probably seen Speaker's Corner on City TV. For a loonie, the sometimes drunk, mostly Gen-X kids espouse their view on anything from lost lovers to fashion tips.

Now YOUtv takes Speaker's Corner to your simchah, be it a wedding, bar/bat mitzvah, birthday or even a corporate party.

We've all been to simchahs where you're sitting at a table talking with someone next to you about why Pulp Fiction is such a great movie and then --Boom!- a videographer sticks his camera into your face. "Say something to the bride and groom!" Sheilding your eyes against the bright glare of the camera lights you say something corny like: "Best wishes and all the best," and return to your discussion.

But YOUtv is different. YOUtv places the videobooth, similar to the one used by Speaker's Corner, unobtrusively in the party room. Guest walk up to this monolith with a TV screen and speak to the screen. The key thing is guests can leave their wishes at their convenience after they've thought of something to say. For more info call YOUtv at 416-591-1300.

Four Seasons offers elegance

When you hold your party in an elegant hall you can be sure your guests feel good and have a great time.

For a large affair, the Four Seasons Hotel at 21 Avenue Rd., (964-0411) is proud to offer the Regency Ballroom, which opens to its own foyer and seats up to 528 guests. An advanced sound, light and projection system enhances live entertainment. Plush carpeting, antique chandeliers and comfortable chairs all add to the guests' enjoyment.

Windows, on the 32nd floor of the hotel, has three penthouse salons and an adjoining foyer which provides a spectacular view of Toronto for private receptions, parties and banquets.

Kosher functions are a specialty and catering director Tamir Shanel says the staff "goes out of its way to ensure that everything is exactly as our guests want." The hotel can provide vegetarian, low salt or low fat meals and can tailor-make menus to suit any taste.

Full course dinners can include cold hors-d'oeuvre such as smoked salmon pinwheels in flour tortilla with hot mustard; bruschetta with tomato, red onion, garlic, basil and olive oil; or tuna mousse and snow-peas on toast points. Hot hors-d'oeuvre include potato knishes, mushroom strudel and chicken or beef satays.

After warm or cold appetizers and salads, meals can include hot or cold soups and fruit sorbets. Entrees include choices from basil balsamic chicken breast with jump fried julienne of sweet peppers and wild mushrooms served with roast garlic potatoes, to baked sesame salmon served with vegetable fried rice.

Fill loot bags with POGs

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

No matter what pains you go to make a great birthday party — you can have creative activities, the best entertainment and the most delicious food — the success of a party in the eyes of a child is often determined by what's in his or her loot bag.

Fortunately, there are discount stores that cater to the birthday-party market, offering good value on a variety of loot for boys and girls of all ages.

Shop-Rite stores has a wide selection of party items at great value. Owner Sidney Lugassy says, "We're very choosey about what kind of merchandise we put in the store ... We shy away from guns. We don't carry weapons. We don't want to portray that image in our stores."

POGs are this years most popular loot bag item for boys, he said, while skipping ropes, stationery, pens and small plush animals are popular with girls. Both sexes enjoy magnetic travel games, outdoor study kits, sidewalk chalk, bubbles, velcro ball catch sets and small water guns.

Shop-Rite stores are located at Lawrence Plaza, Bathurst and Finch, Bathurst and Bloor, and Keele and Finch.

Another store with a huge selection of loot is the discount warehouse store operated Party Packagers, Canada's largest wholesaler of toys and gifts for corporate parties.

The 18,000-sq.ft. flagship store at Finch and Keele — there is also a party outlet store in Burlington — stocks close to 2,000 loot bag items, said co-owner Brian Seetner.

Sales staff are willing to help customers put together loot bags for every budget. "You don't have to spend a lot of money," said marketing and sales administrator Cathy Seetner. The average loot bag costs between $3 and $6. Party Packagers also offers $5 pre-made loot bags geared to girls and boys in every age group.

The store rewards frequent shoppers through its free membership plan. Members get discounts on many items in the store, advance notice of sales, as well as free birthday club memberships for their children aged 12 and under.

Lalique Boutique is known for its fine crystal and glassware

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

The Lalique Boutique in Toronto is the only one of its kind in North America.

Lalique, one of France's most prestigious design houses, is known for its fine crystal and glassware. The family-owned company, now in its third generation, is more than 125 years old.

The Toronto boutique, which offers a full line of Lalique products ranging from crystal to soap and perfume, is owned by Ron Ennis. A dealer in fine crystal and china for more than 25 years, he was approached by Lalique to open its first North American boutique. There are only 20 boutiques worldwide.

The Toronto boutique, nestled in the enclave of exclusive shops on Bloor Street West, carries crystal vases, serving dishes, figurines, stemware, furniture and light fixtures as well as perfume, soap, china, jewelry, handbags and crepe de chine scarves.

The prices range from $17 for gift-boxed soaps to $110,000 for a glass table with a large crystal base in the shape of cactus leaves. The crystal fixtures and vases cost in the thousands of dollars, but smaller figurines and bowls start at $200.

Traditional crystalware.

The collection, a mix of traditional and contemporary design, spans the work of all three generations of the Lalique family.

Company founder Rene Lalique gained a reputation as a leading designer of glass and jewelry at the turn of the century and was the first artisan to design a commercial perfume bottle.

The Bacchantes vase, with a circular relief of 12 dancing muses, is the oldest Lalique design in continuous production, Ennis said. "It's the signature piece of the Lalique collection." The vase was originally made in glass when it was introduced in 1927, but it has been available in a frosted crystal since 1947.

Rene's son Marc, an architect by training, simplified many of the designs but retained the natural imagery, the hallmark of all Lelique creations. He introduced furniture and light fixtures, but removed color from the collection.

Marc's daughter Marie-Claude, who took over the company after his death in 1977, has brought color back to Lalique by adding it to many of her crystal designs. She has also expanded the collection to include other mediums such as gold and silver for the line of crystal cabochon jewelry, silk for scarves and shawls, porcelain, and leather as well as perfume.

"Lalique represents three generations of excellence in design and creation," Ennis said. "Marie-Claude continues the legacy of creative genius that the company has represented for well over 100 years."

Parties made for kids!

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

No fuss, no muss and lots of fun is the aim of every parent for their children's birthday parties. Fortunately, several Toronto businesses are there to help.

Main Space School of Circus Arts (416-694-8951), at 210 Main St., creates a birthday party that children do not easily forget. For 1½-2 hours, circus stars teach the kids the basics of trampoline, acrobatics, trapeze, swinging ladder, uni-cycle, stilt-walking, tightrope and juggling.

"Everything but mime and clowning," says owner Moe Wozniak, who is musical director of a circus and is married to a trapeze artist.

He says not only do the children learn to perform, they put on a show complete with sparkling vests and hats. "They have a ball. Kids just love to perform and this is a perfect outlet for them."

Wozniak says the party begins with all participants seated in a group for a safety briefing. After a short stretch and warm-up, children are split into two groups and rotate to different stations.

"Safety is our first concern and there is always a spotter to make sure the kids are doing things properly. We also ensure that all children are dressed properly — comfortable clothing but not too baggy, bare feet or gymnastic slippers, long hair tied up and no jewelry. Children are prompted on these safety rules before they arrive."

Party packages include hot dogs, pizza or cake and hosts can bring in their own kosher food.

Budding artists will love to have a party at The Plaster Playhouse (416-488-0244), an art centre at 488 Eglinton Ave. W. that offers art classes and a drop-in centre for kids of all ages.

Manager Sofia Roginsky says plaster moulds in all shapes and sizes are the novelty at the Plaster Playhouse "and kids love creating their own special piece of work. It is something they can take home and put on display. They really are proud."

She says the moulds include ballerinas, mermaids, sports figures, rainbows, fruits and vegetables and unicorns and are suitable for boys and girls of all ages.

This girl displays her art done at The Plaster Playhouse.

"They paint it and then we have it glazed, and if they want, apply sparkles. I've never had a child who did not want to make one."

The party includes time in the play centre complete with a ball bath, slide and a full children's kitchen.

"It is the perfect combination of exercise and art. Many kids want to come back to our classes or just drop in to create something else and have more fun," says Roginsky.

Fun City (416-749-5000) is a 150,000-square-foot party centre that boasts a half-mile go-cart track for children 11 years old and over, bumper cars, batting cages, basketball hoops, a mini-golf course and a children's play area that includes a climber, castle and electric jeeps.

Parties are not exclusive to the guests, but within age restrictions, children are free to make use of the whole room.

Hosts have the party room for 45 minutes and then the children have unlimited time to play.

"Parties last as long as they want," says the party manager.

Having fun at the Main Space School of Circus Arts.

Makeup artists should not be overlooked

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

When makeup artist Francine Birken was growing up, she wanted to become part of the simchah circuit so badly that she took up a musical instrument.

Her father Harvey Tishcoff, a renowned jazz violinist, used to come home with stories about the wonderful parties he played at, and Birken (905-881-5527) wanted to get involved.

When her father taught her how to play the guitar, she discovered she had not inherited his musical gifts. She liked playing guitar, she recalled, "but not to the same extent I enjoy the makeup."

A makeup artist for 14 years, Birken assisted at the Miss Canada Pageant for two consecutive years, she has worked behind the scenes at fashion shows and she has done makeovers for a bridal magazine and for television.

The stress of doing your own makeup and worrying about whether it is properly blended or if your mascara has clumped can be avoided if you hire a makeup artist for your simchah, she said.

Makeup, she pointed out, should complement a bride's gown. "If her headpiece is a natural one, if the dress is a princessy one, the makeup should be natural. If the dress is dramatic, you want a more dramatic look."

And since professional makeup enhances photographs, hiring a makeup artist ought not to be overlooked.

"A professional makeup artist knows exactly what the photographer wants to see through the lens. The photographer's work complements the makeup artist's work, and the makeup artist's work complements the photographer's," said Birken

What do photographers want to see? Basically, faces that have a powdery-looking finish and no shiny spots. Blemishes and discolorations should be concealed; foundation ought to be the same color or as close to the tone of the skin as possible; and the makeup has to be well blended.

"When people do their own makeup, they're not going to think about the blending. There's nothing worse than seeing a bride with an orange line on her jaw," said Birken.

She provides her services at numerous weddings, bar and bat mitzvahs each year. While she does a bride's makeup, she tries to keep other people out of the room, to give the bride a break during a happy but sometimes stressful day. "I speak with her and relax her. I've been told that I'm a calming influence."

By "putting yourself in the hands of a professional," said Birken, "you can relax and enjoy the biggest day of your life."

Late last year she branched out into teaching, offering a popular course called Looking Good and Feeling Good at community centres in Richmond Hill and Thornhill. So far 80 women have taken the course, which covers skin care, concealer and foundation, day and evening makeup, and features a complete makeover at the final session.

Makeup by Judy Tobe.

As a teenager, makeup artist Judy Tobe (905-669-5407) of Picture Perfect Makeup always had an interest in makeup. "To me it was like art," she says.

Although she "always had a knack for knowing what goes on people faces" and artistic ability, she would have become a computer programmer if jobs had not been scarce in the early '80s.

Unable to find employment in the computer field, she took a cosmetology course and hasn't looked back since. "I think it was always in my heart," she said. "I wasn't cut out to be a computer programmer."

A makeup artist for the past 13 years, Tobe specializes in photography makeup. She said women are wearing less makeup in the '90s and she has "noticed a lot of brides and other people are very concerned with having too much makeup on."

It makes no difference whether you are wearing a little or a lot, she explained, since "blending is the key to natural-looking makeup."

Proper skin care, including cleansing and moisturizing, is important too, she said. "If skin is radiant and healthy looking, it'll look really smooth under makeup. Makeup goes on better if skin has a lot of moisture and the texture of the skin is smoother."

Makeup artist Estee Levine (905-660-3228) says light blues, pale greens and pinks, including pink eyeshadows, are among this year's fashionable makeup colors, but she stressed that these colors do not suit every women.

"I work with everyone on an individual basis. Just because pinks are in, it doesn't mean they suit everyone," she said.

A makeup artist for 14 years, Levine has loved makeup ever since high school. She was trained by the makeup artist she hired for her own wedding.

She gets many requests for makeup lessons for upcoming bar and bat mitzvahs, and she said she usually makes up the entire bridal party at a wedding. Some brides like the way they looked at their weddings so much that they ask for lessons afterward.

For the best makeup results at your simchah, she offers a few skin care tips: If possible, get a good night's sleep the night before; don't eat greasy food shortly before the party; drink lots of water because it moisturizes the skin (she likes boiled water with lemon); use a moisturizer on your face and your neck and a vitamin E stick for your lips; tweeze your eyebrows three days before the party, not immediately before, as tweezing leaves red marks on the skin; have a gentle facial a month before; and have any waxing done at least a week before the party.

She recommended keeping a tube of lipstick and compact of translucent powder in your evening bag. "Those are two things," she said, "you need for touching up because everything else lasts."

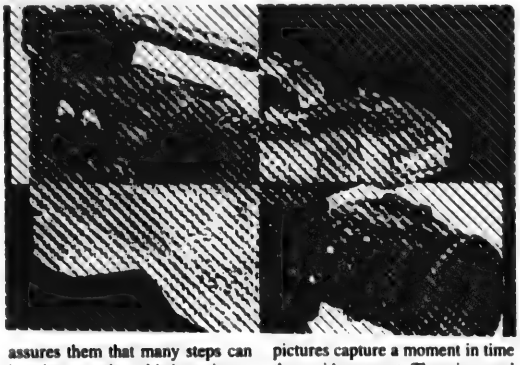
Videos capture the action

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN



Nothing will help you relive your simchah better than a professionally done video.

"Videos capture the emotion, sound and excitement of the party. It is still important to have photographs, but videos really get to the action of the party," says videographer Josh Israel (416-630-5558).

He advises people choosing a videographer to visit at least three before making a decision, saying they should "not be scared off by the most expensive ones. The total expenditure on video usually ends up to be about five per cent of the party's cost. Most people spend more on the decorations which are only there for the evening. Videos are for life," Israel says.

"People need to know who does the camera work and who does the editing. It is much easier to edit a film if the person has been at the party. I'm thinking about the editing process as I shoot the film, and that way it is much easier to come up with a perfect job," he says.

The type of equipment a videographer uses, he adds, makes "all the difference in the world. I use the Sony Betacam-SP format which is genuine TV equipment. This type of equipment offers the best picture quality, best sound, best picture stability, best quality and many other less apparent improvements. Clients with healthy eyesight and up-to-date TVs will see and hear a large improvement."

Israel says many clients are concerned about the videographer intruding upon their affair and he assures them that many steps can be taken to reduce this intrusion to a minimum.

"I wear a tuxedo to every formal function and this helps me blend in instantly. There is no advertising or promoting and very little contact with guests. Just about all the equipment is black, wires are kept off the dance floor and the camera is totally cordless so there are no dangling wires.

"On the other hand, I am aware that staying away from the action can wreck a video more than a minor intrusion. I am always prepared to move in fast if the action takes place in the distance."

Evan Trestan who co-owns 2 Pro Video 416-515-9242 with Shay Schwartzman, agrees that videos create a different memory than photographs.

"Videos capture certain things that photographs cannot, such as an interaction between the couple. They are interactive. They go through moods and can relive the wedding. They do not replace photographs however, because still pictures capture a moment in time that a video cannot. There is a need for both at any affair," says Trestan.

He says a family should meet with the videographer before the affair to provide all necessary information. "This includes a loose schedule of events so he can be prepared for what is coming up. We often get our information from the consultant; so if a speech is coming up, we're there just before it happens."

Trestan said one of the greatest compliments he's received was when one of his clients didn't realize he was there. "It is important to be unobtrusive, yet there at the action."

Holiday packages available to please all honeymooners

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

Tour operators used to offer Canadian couples a slim selection of honeymoon destinations, but with the recent changes in the marketplace there are now quite a few holiday packages to appeal to honeymooners.

Canadians tend to go to places that are offered by tour operators because it is the least expensive way to travel, said Jill Wykes of Sunquest Vacations. Traditionally tour operators offered honeymooners packages to Acapulco, Jamaica and the Barbados.

"Nowadays," she says, "you can choose from about 20 different destinations available out of Toronto."

Sunquest offers packages to Ixtapa and Cancun (in Mexico), Jamaica, the Barbados, St. Maarten, Aruba, Las Vegas, Greece, Italy, Israel and Ireland, as well as romantic Caribbean cruises, all departing on Sundays and Mondays.

The fabulous Sandals resorts in Jamaica and Antigua are a favorite with honeymooners, Wykes says, as are Sunquest's cruises.

The Seaway Crown cruise sails out of Aruba on Sunday nights, with a change in itinerary every second Sunday. The first itinerary features Curacao, Grenada, and the Barbados, while the second includes Dominica, the Barbados, Guadeloupe and Antigua.

"They really spoil you on board ship if you're a honeymooner," says Wykes. Prices, which include return airfare from Toronto, range from $1,299 to $2,899 a week.

She also recommends the Enchanted Garden Resort and Spa, a beautiful resort on a hillside in Ocho Rios, Jamaica. For adults only, the Enchanted Garden was selected by Honeymoon Destination magazine as one of the top 15 resorts in the hemisphere. Prices which start at $1,249 per week, include all meals and drinks, as well as fitness programs. Spa facilities, offering massages, aromatherapy and salon service, are extra.

Package holidays, Wykes says, have "a great appeal to Canadians because you pay in Canadian dollars before you go and you don't spend a lot of U.S. dollars."

Travel agent carry the company's brochures.

Greece is a favorite travel destination with honeymooners because the country is a romantic and stunningly beautiful part of the world, says Clive Farmer of the tour operator Regent Holidays.

The company's Glorious Greece program includes eight package tours starting at $1,499 for one week, but Farmer said he wouldn't recommend the one-week Aegean Splendor package for honeymooners because "it's too short and too rushed."

For honeymooners, he suggests the Classical Odyssey package, which features seven days in Rhodes with a choice of five different hotels, a four-day Greek island cruise and a three-day stay in Athens. The package starts at $1,699.

Another popular honeymoon tour is the Minoan Mosaic package, which is similar to the Classical Odyssey, with seven days on Crete substituted for the stay in Rhodes. Prices begin at $1,749.

Port and departure taxes are added to the basic price of both the Classical Odyssey and the Minoan Mosaic packages. Prices vary depending on the standard of hotel chosen and the choice of cabin — inside or outside.

Both packages are ideal for honeymooners, since there is lots of time to relax on the beach. However, Farmer says Regent's other popular Glorious Greece tours, which feature coach sightseeing tours, do attract some honeymooners.

The Olympian Voyage package, from $2,149, includes a seven-day Istanbul and Greek island cruise and a three-day classical coach tour, visiting sights such as Delphi, Olympia and Naftolin. The Legendary Places tour, from $2,399, features a seven-day Israel, Cyprus and Greek island cruise, a three-day classical coach tour and four days in Athens. A seven-day Israel and Greek island cruise, a three-day classical coach tour and four days in Athens make up Regent's Eastern Heritage tour, which also starts at $2,399.

Regent also offers tours to destinations in Israel, the Caribbean and Central and South America that are suitable for honeymooners, Farmer says, "but the preferred choice is Glorious Greece."

Custom invitations doesn't mean expensive

BY SYLVIA PAPERNICK
Special to the CJN

Stationery is that functional yet decorative party planning element that can set the tone for an event.

The Printed Word, at 563 Eglinton Ave. W. (416-484-4600), has been taking care of people's stationery needs for over 18 years. This retail store carries a full range of invitations, thank you notes and place cards, plus business cards and stationery.

Manager Ann Feldman says the key element is service: those purchasing a full set of invitations receive complimentary addressing. The owners pride themselves on their creativity. As Feldman explains, "custom doesn't necessarily mean expensive."

Invitations can be designed from scratch with color and design variations to give that custom look, without the custom price. They can provide laser printing, engraving or raised printing. Stationery comes from Canada, England, France and the United States.

Matches, napkins and other accessories are available for personalizing as well.

Karen Segal of R.S.V.P. Invitations (416-497-7793) offers personalized service in the comfort of your own home.

Segal comes with samples in hand of invitations for bar and bat mitzvot, Sweet 16s, weddings and birth announcements, as well as personal stationery, all at a discount price. If provided with artwork, she can produce anything.

For weddings, she notes, people are still opting for the classic elegance of black and white, although fuchsias and pinks are popular color schemes.

Most of Segal's clients ask to see a proof before final printing, a step that Segal recommends. "If I promise something, then I'm going to carry out my promise," Segal says.

One example of the type of work created by Marla Sherman.

Marla Sherman of Calligraphy by Marla(416-633-9503) is busy. She has been doing calligraphy for over 10 years, addressing invitations, place settings, envelopes, certificates and thank you notes.

She's been working as a calligrapher since age 16, when she enrolled in a calligraphy class. "It came quite easily to me."

Using a nib and an ink cartridge, Sherman explains that computer calligraphy is often unable to match color shades as precisely as she can. A trained graphic designer, hers is a skill that requires an artistic eye. "My clients like my style because it's elegant, yet not overly scripty, not illegible."

Her work is very affordable, a small expense when considering the actual amount spent on invitations. Sherman says she can turn around an order in under a week.

It's the invasion of the Phantoms of the Opera by Ka-boom Interactive Parties Inc.

Interactive fun all the rage

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

At your next simchah, involve your guests in the entertainment and they'll never want to go home.

Corey Mandell, president of Mandell Entertainment Group (905-886-4000), provides clients with interactive disc jockey entertainment, theme party decor, laser and special effect lighting, giant screen video productions, fun foods and a full line of party novelties.

Mandell's newest entertainment concept is the Party Animator's Dance Troupe, an elite group of dancers who interact with guests, teaching line dances and inducing those who may be hesitant to get up and dance.

"The response has been unbelievable," Mandell says. The dancers have appeared in major Toronto productions like Joseph and the Amazing Technicolor Dreamcoat.

"Party Animators are adding a new dimension to the disc jockey industry," Mandell says. "There have been a few clients in Toronto who have spent upwards of $8,000 (US) to bring this type of party novelty from New York because it was not available in Toronto."

Theme parties are very popular and Mandell Entertainment's decor division, headed by Renee Birnbaum, is able to provide clients with everything needed for a great party. "We have a 4,000-sq.ft. warehouse dedicated to the production of centrepieces, props, sign-in boards, fresh and silk flowers and party giveaways. We truly believe we are a one-stop party shop to the fullest extent of the meaning."

Mandell is also set to open a 350-capacity hall this fall, capable of transforming into a "state of the art nightclub."

David Hart, owner of Hart Entertainment (764-2200), says his company specializes in providing parties with such activities as "carnival games, a bungee run, dunk tanks, sumo wrestling, mini-golf, inflatable castles, sports games — almost anything you desire."

Hart, who started out as a magician in 1973, says kids and adults have a great time when kept busy. "At a bar mitzvah, a typical meal takes about 90 minutes, but kids finish eating in 15 to 20 minutes." He keeps them busy with carnival games or a pitching cage. "They'll have a ball and the adults can enjoy their meal."

Hosts can visit Hart's interactive showroom and try everything out. "You don't know half of what we have until you come and check it out."

Hart stresses interactive parties are easily kept within budget because clients can rent as little or as much equipment as desired. A casino package with blackjack table and wheel of fortune runs less than $100.

Hart Entertainment also promotes about 850 different types of live entertainment such as strolling musicians, magicians, jugglers, face painters and unicyclists.

Ka-boom Interactive Parties Inc. (483-6811) provides an evening of entertainment that mixes audience participation with Broadway-calibre production numbers and special effects.

Owner Bill Greenbaum says between six and 10 dancers perform before, during and after dinner, wearing "outrageous" costumes.

"Guests participate at their own comfort level," he says. "Extroverts will indulge themselves to the extreme while more conservative people involve themselves to a lesser degree. Everyone, however, has a good time."

Greenbaum says a typical Ka-boom evening could start with 20,000 Leagues Under the Sea and switch to Dick Tracy, Space Fantasy, Rio Carnival, Elvis, Show Boat or Miss Saigon. "The audience never knows what will happen next," he says.

Greenbaum says he can provide entertainment for weddings, bar/bat mitzvahs, graduations or anniversaries from coast-to-coast.

Good photographers are unobtrusive

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

Doing the hora. Photo by Stuart Moscoe Photography.

Choosing a photographer can be difficult because there are so many to choose from and so many different styles and kind of work.

To get the photographer you want, says Stuart Moscoe of Stuart Moscoe Photography (905-881-8769), book six months to a year in advance. Moscoe, like many photographers, prefers a hands-on approach, doing most of the work himself.

Others, besides working personally, offer clients a variety of styles by hiring other photographers to work with them.

Dean Macdonnell of Macdonnell Photography (416-481-4600) says photographers should be picked at least nine months in advance. He says despite the new technology available in the industry, tradition is more popular for wedding photos.

New technologies like digital imaging, which can combine two photos to make them look like one, do not play a key role in wedding photography, whereas old-fashioned black and white work, conservative as it is, is enjoying a comeback, he says.

Many of the techniques used in producing fine finished work, Macdonnell says, are not new; printing on rag paper and the use of metal toners are tried and proven techniques.

Elliott Sylman of Elliott Sylman Photography (416-635-6749) already has bookings for 1997. He says when you're thinking of choosing a photographer you have to like both the photos and the photographer. At your simchah, technology is secondary as long as the photographer is a competent, conscientious professional. What matters is the quality and personality of work.

Moscoe adds that at a simchah, a professional photographer is unobtrusive to guests and coordinates well with other professionals like a videographer.

Like a cherished gift, a photograph is a keepsake, meant to endure through time. Black and white captures the enduring qualities of a special person at a special time, without looking dated. It forces the photographer — and the viewer — to pay more attention to light, shade and texture, and often leaves the imagination more free play than color photography.

Macdonnell points out that 95 per cent of photography is done by amateurs, or by ad agencies and others who produce volume work. He and the others who do professional personalized work are in the remaining five per cent; yet theirs is the work which lasts.

All photographers agree that videos and photos complement each other, each having a different role. Macdonnell says photos are best for capturing the enduring aspect of a personality, videos for the transitory moments that would otherwise be forgotten.

"Videos," says Sylman, "capture the party; photos are perennial, and capture the person."

Video and photography go together, Moscoe says, because video captures the atmosphere or flavor of the affair, while photography captures the highlights.

Estimates of how much to spend on photographs range from under 10 per cent of your wedding budget to over 20 per cent. All photographers agree that you should book as far ahead as possible.

Custom-made ketubot

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

An example of Maxine Blendis' work.

Artist Maxine Blendis creates personalized works of art with Jewish themes and calligraphy to commemorate special life cycle events like weddings, bar/bat mitzvahs and births. But she is best known for her hand-painted ketubot (Jewish marriage certificate).

There has been a resurgence of interest in decorated ketubot, she says. "People want something beautiful and meaningful. You hope your marriage will be that way."

The ketubot are designed to be displayed, she says. "It's not just something you put away in drawer. It's a work of art."

Blendis invites couples to her studio where they can look through her portfolio to get some ideas. As a lecturer on Jewish and biblical art, she is familiar with traditional styles of ketubot from many cultures. She can design works incorporating symbols and styles from the Italian Renaissance and Spain's Golden Age.

Some people prefer contemporary designs, and her unusual family trees are becoming increasingly popular, she said. "There are endless possibilities as to what can be done. Every piece is unique."

She works in ink, watercolor and gouache. There are also limited editions of hand-painted prints. Prices for the ketubot range from $120 for a complete full color print to $750 for a hand-painted and hand-calligraphied work.

For gifts for other occasions Blendis integrates biblical passages and quotations — in Hebrew and English — with artwork. Such works, which start at $25 for hand-painted limited-edition prints, are often given as bar and bar mitzvah gifts, she said.

"I find that children of bar mitzvah age so appreciate receiving a personalized work of art to commemorate the event as so many of their gifts are of a more material nature."

A gift such a mizrach (decorative art put on the wall in the direction of Jerusalem) is suitable for engagements weddings, and anniversaries, Blendis said. Her mizrach can incorporate the hamza (used against the evil eye) birds and a Magen David.

For young children and births, Blendis does brightly colored animals and figures forming the letters of the child's name.

Her decorative ketubot have also become a popular anniversary gift item. Married couples are ordering them to celebrate wedding anniversaries because their original ketubot are plain, Blendis said.

"It's an extra special gift when people have everything. They don't need another piece of jewelry by their 20th or 25th anniversary. It's lovely to get a meaningful and beautiful and gift to celebrate an enduring marriage."

Registries remove the guessing

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

Among businesses offering personalized products or services, no two are alike. This seems especially true of businesses with bridal registries.

Taps (416-785-0224), which has just opened its registry, specializes in decorative or finishing touches for the bathroom, like towel bars, shower curtains and bath mats — or, as Mike Spiro of Taps says, "one-stop shopping" for accessories.

"Register by appointment with Sally," says Spiro. "She'll give you a guided tour, and undivided attention for an hour or two."

Taps' prices have large discounts, but to maintain the savings, there is no delivery, only cash-and-carry. The registry is free.

Sara Levine-Petroff of A Show of Hands (416-782-1696) sees her store as a contemporary crafts gallery for fine glass, pottery and other artistic gifts. She sees herself as the intermediary between the artist and the recipient of the gift.

"The point of giving," says Levine-Petroff, "is for the gift to be as individual as the recipient."

In choosing for people you don't know, she advises, pick objects in neutral colors or sculpted glasswork which belongs in any setting.

Bridal registrants at A Show of Hands are shown work currently in the gallery; then they see more work by any artist who interests them. Personalized gifts can be ordered. There is also an approval policy — before deciding on a purchase, you can take it home for a couple of days to see if you like it.

A Show of Hands has gift certificates and will wrap your gift free; there is a charge for delivery.

Annabelle Turner of Rob Macintosh China (416-730-0628) offers an extensive list of beautiful and useful gifts: china, flatware, stemware, stainless steel and Edinburgh crystal. Purely for beauty, there are Lladro or Coalport figurines, Myth and Magic science fiction figures, glass sculptures by Jonasson and Waterford clocks with crystal frames. Macintosh is also a large distributor of collector plates.

As a chain with 12 branches and another opening this summer, Macintosh offers an advantage to registry customers. They can visit the store most convenient to them; each has a copy of the registry, which is updated daily. Bridal dishes here are discounted 20 to 60 per cent, with the discount guaranteed until three months after the wedding. If the discount increases or decreases, the customer gets whichever is bigger. Gift certificates are available.

Spiro recommends registering when the wedding date is set, well before sending invitations; Turner says to register before sending invitations to the engagement party. Agreeing that it is best to register early, Levine-Petroff also advises registrants to visit A Show of Hands three or four weeks before the gift-giving event, as the work on display is always changing.

There is a special pleasure in wishing a couple happiness as they begin one of life's greatest adventure. It is also good business. Satisfied customers come back, as time passes, to buy gifts for birthdays, bar and bat mitzvahs, graduation parties and other family celebrations.

Unique kitchen items

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Choosing the right gift isn't easy. And it's even more difficult if you're out shopping for a wedding or anniversary gift because you've got to please two people instead of one.

One solution is to buy kitchen utensils. Everybody's got to eat, so it's always nice — no matter who does the cooking — to get some new appliance.

Salton Canada offers a complete line of unusual kitchen appliances from Salton, Kenwood, and iSi. "We like to pride ourselves on the uniqueness of our products," said regional sales coordinator Chris Shipton.

Henrietta the Hen is an egg cooker made by Salton which boils and poaches eggs perfectly. "The nice thing about her is that she clucks when the eggs are done," Shipton said. Henrietta sells for $35 to $45 and is carried by Eaton's and the Bay.

The Rosle line of precision stainless steel kitchen utensils from Germany is high quality and reputed to be "the Cadillac of utensils," said Beth Shackleford, national sales and marketing manager of Browne and Company. Browne is the Canadian distributor of Rosle products.

"These items have become very popular for bridal gifts," Shackleford said. "There is nothing like them around."

The hook series is designed to hang onto a special metal rail. Ladles, skimmers and spatulas in this series are $35 each. The rails range in size and cost between $35 and $90.

The Rosle products are sold at the Main Course, The Complete Kitchen and Metro Kitchen. These stores carry Rosle catalogues.

Chrétien: hate crimes law soon; 'proceeding' on war criminals

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Prime Minister Jean Chrétien delivered two promises to Canada's Jewish community last week, one vague and the other specific.

In a well-received speech at a glitzy dinner presented by the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem, Chrétien pledged that his government's controversial legislation calling for stiffer sentences for hate crimes will be passed before the House of Commons' summer recess, set to begin June 23.

But less precise was his promise to pursue suspected Nazi criminals, saying only that his government "is proceeding with outstanding cases now. We are committed to bringing these cases to justice as quickly as possible in their countries of origin."

That was the sole reference in Chrétien's speech to Ottawa's new approach to the war criminal dossier — deportation of suspects (four to date) instead of trials in Canada. The prime minister presented no timetable and no explanation as to why suspects were not prosecuted until now.

Nevertheless, Chrétien's presence set the audience of 1,000 abuzz. He was joined by his wife Aline to commemorate the 50th anniversary of the liberation of Europe's death camps and to honor the memory of the Holocaust's six million Jewish victims.

The dinner paid tribute to Toronto philanthropist Leslie Dan, who has donated at least $1 million

U.S. embassy move seen as a certainty

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The United States will inevitably move its embassy from Tel Aviv to West Jerusalem, predicts the executive director of an influential American research institution.

"It's not a question of whether but of when," said Robert Satloff of the Washington Institute for Near East Policy.

In an interview following a closed meeting sponsored by the Canada-Israel Committee, Satloff conveyed the impression that the matter has been more or less settled despite its controversial nature.

Last month, amid Arab protests, two bills were presented in the U.S. Congress calling upon the Clinton administration to begin construction of a new embassy in western Jerusalem in May 1996.

Opponents claim the proposed legislation will interfere with final status talks on Jerusalem, scheduled to get under way at the same time.

Satloff, who holds a doctorate in Middle East history from Oxford University, disputed the conventional wisdom that moving the embassy will have a detrimental effect on Arab-Israeli peace talks.

Since 1949, the United States, in "a de facto sense," has recognized West Jerusalem as Israel's capital, he pointed out. (Israel annexed East Jerusalem in 1967, but its claim is not accepted by either the United States or the PLO.)

Satloff, 33, said three U.S. presidents and a succession of secretaries of state have visited West Jerusalem, while two presidents have delivered speeches in the Knesset.

The United States, therefore, has not shirked from implied recognition of West Jerusalem as Israel's capital.

In a backhanded way, he added, PLO chief Yasser Arafat should not be displeased by Washington's stance, since it could lend credence to his claim to East Jerusalem as the capital of a future Palestinian state.

Turning to another topic, Satloff said the Middle East Peace Facilitation Act — which channels American funds to the Palestine National Authority (PNA) in the Gaza Strip and Jericho — will likely be renewed by Congress on June 30.

Match found for Jay Feinberg

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Sometimes the good guys do get a break.

After four years and hundreds of blood screenings all over the world, an almost-perfect bone marrow donor has been found for Jay Feinberg.

While Friends of Jay, the umbrella organization that coordinated the screenings and the fundraising, is not releasing the donor's name at this time, they do say that she is a young American woman, who was identified through the bone marrow registry.

Feinberg is entering the Fred Hutchinson Cancer Research Centre in Seattle, Wash., this week for pre-treatment. The transplant is scheduled for the end of June or early July.

His condition is considered stable, although he is weak.

Canadians, especially in Toronto and Montreal, took Jay to their hearts, holding what Arlene Feinberg, Jay's mother, called some of the most successful of drives, ranging from a 2,000-strong screening at Toronto's Shaarei Shomayim synagogue last year to numerous private fundraising and prayer campaigns by schoolchildren.

Much of the testing was made possible with help from Dynacare Labs.

Friends of Jay plans to continue to raise funds and organize donor drives for others who need a bone marrow transplant.

The News In Brief

Canada

Gun Control Backed

TORONTO — Canadian government proposals to require the registration of firearms could be a valuable tool against extremist groups, the Simon Wiesenthal Centre believes.

Canadian counterparts to the U.S. militias, Ku Klux Klan and Aryan Nations share the same racist ideology and "the same morbid fascination with weapons and explosives," says a statement from the centre.

"Whatever small inconvenience will be imposed on honest, law-abiding citizens will be more than compensated by greater peace and security in their communities," the centre stated.

Human Rights Prize

TORONTO — The first annual Ludwik and Estelle (Stella) Jus Memorial Human Rights Prize has been awarded to Cranford Pratt, professor emeritus at the University of Toronto.

Pratt helped establish the Committee for a Just Canadian Policy Towards Africa in 1970 to put pressure on Ottawa to adopt a more critical stance on apartheid.

The award was established at the university in memory of two Polish educators who risked their lives during the Holocaust to save others.

Quastel Installed

VANCOUVER — Susan Quastel has been installed as president of the Vancouver chapter of Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University. She succeeds Dr. Jerry Hamovich.

Quastel, a native of Amsterdam, has been involved in several groups, including Hadassah-WIZO, STAR (an organization that helps seniors), the Jewish Festival of Arts and the Vancouver Holocaust Centre.

Liberation 'Accidental'

VICTORIA — The World War II Allies never intended to liberate Europe's concentration camps, British Columbia MLA Bernie Simpson said in a recent speech to the B.C. legislature.

Simpson, the province's only Jewish MLA, said, "The so-called liberation was, at best, a never-intended result of military planning. The camps were never once a priority of field commanders..."

Proof of that claim, he said, is that Allied troops arrived at the camps completely unprepared to handle the inmates.

Israel

Women's Demands

JERUSALEM — The government should immediately introduce regulations allowing women to read the Torah and wear a tallit at the Western Wall, a petition to the High Court of Justice demanded last Tuesday.

The petition was filed by Jerusalem city councillor Anat Hoffman and the Women of the Wall organization, as a follow-up to two earlier petitions.

'New' Gate Found

JERUSALEM — Excavation has begun on an ancient gate in the wall surrounding the Old City.

The gate was found some 30 metres west of Dung Gate.

Archaeologists dated the gate from the 12th century. It was sealed during Ottoman rule over the city, they said.

These Boots

JERUSALEM — Boots made by a 75-year-old shoemaker in Holon have been found in scientific tests to be considerably safer than new boots being issued to the Israel Defence Force.

The tests found that the Holon-made boots significantly reduce the risk of painful stress fractures, which affect a quarter to one-third of troops.

World

Bleak Future

KIEV — Most Ukrainian Jews want to emigrate to Israel but are afraid to, says a Jewish Agency emissary.

Yoref Tropiansky told a recent Toronto UJA mission that this year, 26,000 Jews from Ukraine are expected to make aliyah. Nearly 160,000 Ukrainian Jews have settled in Israel since 1989.

He said that "it is very dangerous to be a Jew" in Ukraine and he predicted a less than promising future for the country's 475,000 remaining Jews.

Extradition Ordered

ASUNCION, Paraguay — A judge here last week agreed to extradite seven suspects to Argentina in connection with the March 1992 bombing of the Israeli embassy in Buenos Aires.

The suspects include five Lebanese men and a Brazilian woman. The seventh suspect, a man born in Lebanon, has obtained Brazilian citizenship.

Five of the suspects waived their right to appeal the extradition, saying they were willing to appear before an Argentine court to face charges for the embassy car bombing, which killed 29 people.

Jews Reassured

BRUSSELS — Jews here breathed a sigh of relief last month when Belgian extremists did not fare as well in parliamentary elections as had been predicted.

The centre-left government of Prime Minister Jean Luc Dehaene held its majority, with a 17.1 per cent vote nationwide.

The Flemish Bloc, which campaigned on an anti-immigrant platform, captured 7.8 per cent of the vote, a 1.2 per cent increase over previous results.

Ruling Welcomed

SYDNEY — The Jewish community of New South Wales, Australia's most populous state, has welcomed a landmark legal decision against racism.

A city council member in the New South Wales city of Wagga Wagga was ordered to apologize publicly to Australian aboriginals for calling them "half-breeds" and "savages." He was fined $2,200.

New French Leader

PARIS — Henri Hajdenberg, 48, was elected May 21 to serve a three-year term as president of the Representative Council of French Jewish Institutions, known by its French acronym, CRIF.

Hajdenberg, a lawyer, defeated Roger Pinto, 62, for the leadership of the umbrella body representing France's secular Jewish organizations.

Hajdenberg replaces Jean Kahn, 64, who will continue to serve as president of the European Jewish Congress.

Why Benjamin's?

Families tell us again and again that our time spent meeting with them is more comforting than sympathy.

For instance, only at Benjamin's is there the opportunity of discussion with licensed funeral directors who are Jewish. There is a depth of Jewish knowledge to draw upon, and the assurance of personal supervision that leaves no doubt about strict religious observance.

They receive sensitive advice respecting unique family circumstances when they ask about alternatives and express their preferences. They know with confidence that Kovod and dignity will always prevail.

Families recognize that more than a license is needed when there is just one chance to honour the memory of a loved one without incident and according to Jewish custom. For them, the difference at Benjamin's is worth everything.

Rain fails to slow UJA marchers

2,000 turn out for annual trek

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Organizers of United Jewish Appeal's Community March for Israel weren't kidding when they said the annual event would proceed "rain or shine."

Despite a steadily worsening rainfall, 2,000 marchers hiked the five kilometres along Bathurst Street from Thornhill's Promenade Shopping Mall to the Bathurst Jewish Centre (BJC) in North York.

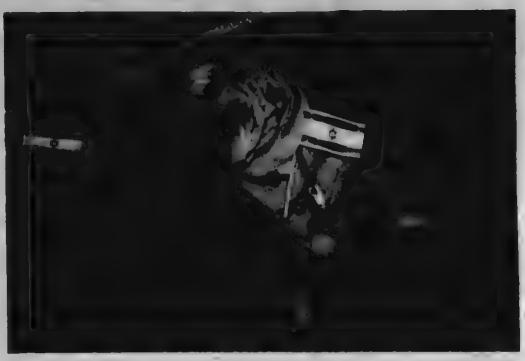
"A little fresh air never hurt anyone," said an undaunted 9-year-old, her long hair plastered to her head and her sopping running shoes squishing as she walked.

At least two people ventured out in wheelchairs, joining the parade of marchers, many of whom held or wore the Israeli flags which were handed out at registration.

The walk was led by Yossi Goldberg and Gabi Kadosh, mayors of Metulla and Eilat respectively. The latter is Israel's southernmost city; the former its northernmost. The UJA funds projects in both cities.

Accompanying the two Israeli mayors were the Toronto youngsters who had raised the most money — Tamara Zicherman, and Nataniel and Eliezer Philosophe. Approximately $150,000 in total was raised for young olim recently arrived in Israel.

At the post-march festival, which featured a covered petting zoo, participants warmed up with hot dogs and coffee under the overhang of the Lipa Green building. On hand were a variety of entertainers, including the a cappella group The Simple Tones, and Barney, the dinosaur of television fame.



The weather may have been fit for the dogs (above), but the youngster in the stroller was ready to be part of the March for Israel, rain or shine. [Stephen Epstein photo]

UJA to ask contributors for three-year commitment

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The 1996 United Jewish Appeal (UJA) campaign will ask its supporters for a three-year commitment to free up time and energy for vital needs, co-chairs Carol Kassel and Chuck Gold announced recently.

The news was relayed to campaign leaders under a large red and blue banner bearing the words, "Boldly go where no campaign has ever gone before."

Even if only 20 or 30 per cent of UJA donors agree to a three-year pledge it will provide the opportunity in the second and third years to concentrate on new gifts and donors who have not renewed, and for canvassers to strengthen personal links with supporters when they do not have to ask for a donation, Kassel said.

"No one has ever tried this before. Every other campaign will be watching us," she said.

For the first time, mounting needs in the community have resulted in UJA's allocating more of its campaign total to local requirements than to Israel, Gold said. In 1996, 51.4 per cent will be for local needs and 48.6 per cent for Israel.

Local agency budgets have had to be cut by 5.5 per cent, he said.

Mark Gryfe, former campaign director, told the meeting he is leaving UJA after 17 years, to become national executive director of The Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University, taking up his new duties in the fall. Ted Sokolsky is the new UJA campign director.

Gryfe said there are signs that UJA commitment, which has made Toronto an outstanding Jewish communal leader, is weakening and that the problem has to be addressed directly.

Most Jews in Toronto have a picture of the community in their minds which does not reflect reality because the community has changed so much in the past 20 years, he said.

It has grown from 97,000 to 162,505 in 20 years, and now represents 46 per cent of Canadian Jewry. Despite a popular conception that much of Toronto's increase has resulted from the Montreal exodus, Gryfe pointed out that 15,000 came from countries outside Canada in the past 10 years, 2,500 from other provinces and 4,800 from other places within Ontario.

Seven of every eight Jews live along the Bathurst corridor in Toronto, North York or Vaughan. Twenty per cent live in Toronto, 44 per cent in North York and 27 per cent in York Region. The latter, he said, is a region virtually "unserviced."

At Bathurst and Sheppard, 50 per cent of Jews are over 65 while in Bathurst Manor the figure is 32 per cent.

One of seven Jews in Toronto lives below the poverty line, 57 per cent being women and 43 per cent men. One of every 10 children under age 14 lives in poverty. The poor are three times as likely to live alone. Immigrants arriving in the last 10 years make up 10 per cent of the total population but 18 per cent of Jewish poor.

Baruch Gur to work as UJA shaliach

TORONTO — The man who developed and executed the master plan to rescue Jews from the former Soviet Union (FSU) will soon be working for Toronto's UJA.

Baruch Gur begins a two-year assignment early in June as the Jewish Agency's Toronto shaliach.

In 1990, Gur created the blueprint used by the Agency to organize the exodus of Soviet Jews.

"It called for massive Agency involvement, spread all over the country, with offices in every city with over 10,000 Jews," he said.

Since 1990, nearly 600,000 Soviet Jews have moved to Israel. Today, more than 20,000 residents of Russia and the former Soviet republics are enrolled in Agency Hebrew courses; there are 17 departure points for Israel inside the former Soviet Union, and Gur predicts strong aliyah for the balance of this decade.

"There are 1.3 million Jews left — the majority in Russia and roughly 500,000 in Ukraine. Every year until the end of this century, at least 110,000 will leave. By the year 2,000, only 500,000 Jews will remain."

Baruch Gur

Gur is leaving the Agency's Soviet desk because his mission has been so successful. "After passing the peak of building the organization, it was time to step down," he said. "I found a warm Jewish community in Toronto. When the offer came, I thought it would be a good idea."

United Jerusalem will remain capital of Israel, says Begin

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Binyamin Begin, son of former Israeli prime minister Menachem Begin, was in Toronto recently to address a Yom Yerushaliyim rally sponsored by One Israel-Canadian Friends of Yesha.

Begin, a Likud MK, told the enthusiastic crowd he supports the Labor government decision to exclude foreign governmental institutions, including the PLO, from Jerusalem.

"Jerusalem, united city, [will] always be the capital city of the State of Israel and exclusively so," he told the crowd at B'nai Torah Congregation.

Begin said he is behind the government's position that Arab representatives of Jerusalem cannot serve on a future Arab Council in Judea, Samaria and Gaza following elections.

Binyamin Begin

Jewish Jerusalem has many enemies, he said, including PLO chairman Yasser Arafat, who subscribe to a treaty signed after the Muslims conquered the city from the Christians in 638 CE. Under the treaty hundred of millions of Arabs and more than a million Muslims came to view Jerusalem as their holy city.

"For them it is holy and we as human beings should respect honest, sincere genuine feelings. The only thing we demand is reciprocity from that point of view."

Begin added that the Arabs and the Muslim world cannot accept that Israel, with a population of only 4.5 million Jews, controls Jerusalem.

When Arafat talks about Jerusalem to Muslims, as he did in a mosque in Johannesburg in May 1994, he almost always refers to that treaty. "This is why they do not let go and why they wouldn't let go," Begin said.

Toronto-Eilat special ties

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

Eilat Mayor Gabi Kadosh chats with his Toronto counterpart, Barbara Hall. [Barry Shainbaum photo]

TORONTO — Gabi Kadosh may have felt a little out of his element when he helped lead the rain-drenched March for Israel last week.

Coming from the desert city of Eilat, where cloudless skies and 40 degree heat are de rigeur in late May, the cool wet weather was a shock to his system.

But a day later, still sporting a summery tan, Kadosh was extolling the virtues of Israel's southernmost city.

Kadosh, 41, has served as mayor of Eilat for 1½ years, during which the city has enjoyed an unprecedented boom.

Tourism is feeding that economic growth, generated in large measure by the favorable media coverage following peace between Israel and Jordan, he said.

Sun worshippers are now visiting Eilat in record numbers. Developers are adding 2,000 hotel rooms to Eilat's stock of 6,000, and the city expects to have 12,000 rooms available by the turn of the century, Kadosh said. Eilat already boasts a year-round occupancy rate of 85 per cent, high by industry standards, serving large number of Scandinavian, British and French visitors.

The city is a free trade zone and Israel's closest port to the markets of the Far East, making it attractive to hi-tech industries.

As well, Eilat is hoping to turn itself into an international banking centre on the model of the Cayman Islands and is leading the way in developing a fish-farming industry and desalination plants, he said.

With all that activity, the city is rapidly adding to its population base of 38,000, as people from all over Israel, and many recent Russian olim, head south to fill the jobs the boom has created. Six thousand apartments are being erected to house that influx.

Yet there's a dark side to Eilat's rapid growth.

Most of the new jobs are low-paying and attract single parents trying to make ends meet. The cost of living in Eilat is higher than the rest of the country.

That's where Kadosh's visit to Canada comes in. Eilat has been a recipient of the United Jewish Appeal's (UJA) Project Renewal efforts since 1989, as Toronto Jews help the city provide a wide range of social welfare amenities for its population.

Despite the boom, Eilat still needs help providing adequate social services, Kadosh, a Likudnik, said.

Single parents who work in the hotels need day care facilities for their children. Workers need help in getting housing. There is a need for family planning counselling, women's shelters, community centres and programs for disadvantaged youth, he said.

Since 1989, Toronto's Project Renewal has allocated about $4 million for projects in Eilat. The Jewish community here also participates in the design, planning and supervision of the projects.

Kadosh would like to see more direct involvement, with Torontonians volunteering to spend time in Eilat teaching English and helping open new schools.

"We don't want people to be misled by Eilat's astonishing growth," he said. "For social projects, we still need more ... The money sent from Canada goes to the people who need it the most."

Kadosh was joined by Metulla mayor Yossi Goldberg in leading the March for Israel, bringing together Israel's northernmost and southernmost communities. Both receive major financial assistance from Toronto's Jewish community.

Vancouver congregation finds a new home

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — After operating out of a hotel room and members' homes for three years, Congregation Shaarey Tefilah has settled into a permanent home.

The official opening was held May 28 at the space in an industrial/residential condominium complex at 16th Avenue and Heather. The Aron Kodesh was donated by Victor Setton.

Rabbi Ronald Price, executive vice-president of the Union for Traditional Judaism (UTJ) of New Jersey, officiated at the opening. The shul's rabbi, appointed in time for services last Rosh Hashanah, is Mordechai Scher.

Congregation president Dr. Arhur Hayes said Shaarey Tefilah is the first Vancouver shul operating under the aegis of the UTJ. He said Shaarey Tefiliah's aim is to reach out to unaffiliated Jewish families, especially younger ones, "so they won't be lost to Judaism."

There is both separate and mixed seating for 200 men and women in the 2,500-sq.ft. shul. The oak pews, donated by Allan and Erma Blumanfald and family, are placed at angles to give a "more welcome" feeling to congregants, Hayes said.

Women's group says Israel a 'democratic dictatorship'

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The Israeli government has taken away the hopes, dreams and dignity of the Jewish people, claims the co-founder of Women for Israel's Tomorrow.

"The Jewish majority in Israel is screaming that they have had enough of the government that has tricked them," said Nadia Matar at a recent lecture at Beth Avraham Yoseph Synagogue.

"It is a government that takes its direction from the extreme left and no longer believes in the Jewish state ... a government that has turned into a democratic dictatorship," she said.

Matar was in Toronto as a representative of the organization also known as Women in Green, composed of thousands of women known for their trademark green hats. The group seeks to heighten awareness of issues it feels threaten the survival of Israel.

Matar said the board of Women in Green is made up of women but "it is not a feminist group. We bring a feminine side to our struggle ... Our strength is that we do not belong to any political party and we are composed of women from every spectrum of life."

Weekly vigils help keep up the group's profile.

"We have become a real force and we are like little flies that annoy the government. We even bang pots and pans" when the government meets.

She said that although Women in Green is in Toronto to raise funds, "we don't only need your money, we need you to go to the streets. It is your land also and the government is giving this land away. An exchange of land for peace will leave the safety of Israel in Arab hands. The State of Israel is in danger and if it is in danger, you also are in danger.

"Join us in the fight for Am Israel. You need us to fight there, but we need you to fight here. Only then can we overcome the black cloud. Our platform is simple. We want our children and grandchildren to live as Jews in Israel. We believe that Jerusalem will be Jewish forever."

Matar's lecture was sponsored by several Toronto organizations as well as Canadian Friends of Women for Israel's Tomorrow.

בלשים לקיץ

הקיץ מגיע ואולי יהיה לנו יותר זמן לקרוא ספרים. מתי קראתם לאחרונה ספר בעברית? אני בטוח שהתשובה מגוונת - חלק קראו אתמול וחלק רק לפני שנה. או לאלה גם לאלה כמה המלצות בלי יומרות ספרותיות. בראש ובראשונה - נעים לגלות שסוף סוף , אחרי אלפיים שנות, הולך ומתחזק בארץ סגנון ספרי הבלש בעברית. מה אגיד לכם - לא נופל מאגאתה כריסטי ושרלוק הולמס ! מי מיכם שלא קרא עדיין את ספריה של בתיה גור " הרצח בחוג לספרות", "לינה משותפת " ודומיהם - מחכה לו תענוג אמיתי. המפקח מיכאל אוחיון לא נופל מגברת מרפל ולא מחוויר לעומת ג'יימס בונד. השנה יצאו בארץ שני ספרי מתח שמצליחים מאוד ושבתי להקדיש להם מילה טובה. " מלכודת הדבש" הוא סיפורה של רוזמה אמריקנית, עולה חדשה, שמסתבכת בעלילות מסתוריות. הספר כתוב בצורה מאוד אמינה ואין בו כל זיוף או ויתור. למרות שהמחבר הוא גבר (אמנון זקונט), העלילה שמסופרת בפי אישה בגוף ראשון- נשמעת מאוד אמינה, נשית ורכה. מאחר והמספרת היא עולה חדשה מארצות הברית- ההסתכלות שלה על התרבות הישראלית, החל ברעשנות וכלה בגברים שאוהבים לנמור מהר - מאוד משעשעת.

בטור הקודם הבטחתי לכם בעיה רפואית אמיתית שעומדת להיות דילמה יום יומית להרבה רופאים וחולים. אז הינה: פארקינסון היא מחלה נוירולוגית קשה שגורמת לנכות מתמדת. אנשים מאבדים את כושר התנועה שלהם וההפרעה מלווה ברעד קשה. פארקינסון נגרמת עקב פגיעה בתאי עצב המרכיבים את המערכת האקסטרה פיראמידלית במוח. בשנים האחרונות חלה אמנם התקדמות רבה בפיתוח תרופות לפארקינסון , אך חולים רבים אינם זוכים להקלה אמיתית עם התרופות הקיימות. והינה - לצד פיתוח התרופות מצאו מדענים שניתן להשתיל במוחו של חולה פארקינסון בו נפגעו תאי העצב האקסטרה פיראמידליים - תאי עצב חדשים שנלקחו ממוח של עוברים! בהתחלה נוסה התהליך בחיות ורק לאחרונה - בבני אדם. בניתוח קל יחסית משתילים לחולה הפארקינסון פיסות קטנות של רקמת מוח עובר ובמקרים רבים נגרמת הקלה דרמטית ואף היעלמות של הפארקינסון. ניתוחים שלאחר המוות (אצל חולים שמתו מסיבות שונות) מצאו שתאי העובר נקלטו ותפקדו היטב. עד כאן - המהפכה הדרמטית, ועכשיו הבעיה : מאיפה לוקחים מוח של עוברים ? כמובן, מהפלות. הפלות הן כידוע אחת הסיבות הלוהטות ביותר בארה"ב, ומליוני אמריקנים מתנגדים להן. יותר מזה - מי ימנע מאיש עשיר שיש לו פארקינסון "לתמוך" בנערה עניה בתנאי ש"תתרום" את העובר שלה? או אולי אפילו תיכנס להריון כדי לתרום עובר. נשמע נורא, לאז כדי למנוע תסריטים נוראיים כאלה, פועלים בכל בתי החולים שבהם מתנהלים ניתוחים מסוג זה ועדות אתיקה שמפקחות בקפדנות ששום חוק לא יופר. יתרה מכך - רשויות המחקר, המקציבות סכומי עתק לביצוע ניתוחים כאלה - בודקות את התהליך בזכוכיות חמגדלת שלהן. עד כאן - העולם המערבי והמדינות הדמוקרטיות שבהן זכויות האזרח נשמרות בקפדנות.

רץ ישראלי יקר :

Correction

Little words can make a big difference. In the essay by Rabbi Jay Kelman Counting the days to Shavuot which appeared in last week's issue, we inadvertently dropped two important words and changed two syllables of another. The correct text should have read:

"In enumerating the 613 biblical mitzvot that a Jew must observe, there are those who do not count the belief in the existence of G-d amongst them. However, without this basic belief, Judaism is meaningless...

"So too, only once we accept the Torah can we begin to discuss its meaning. It is super*fluous* to mention that the Torah was accepted on Shavuot, because our observance of the holiday itself testifies to its acceptance...".

Our apologies to writer and reader.

War crimes case delayed until July 6

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Alleged war criminal Joseph Nemsila will have to wait until July 6 to see whether the case to deport him will go ahead.

Last week, Nemsila's lawyer Barbara Jackman and federal lawyer Christopher Amerasinghe agreed to the delay to prepare legal arguments on the question of Nemsila's permanent residence.

In addition, a number of key documents are still being translated and federal authorities have yet to make full disclosure of their case against Nemsila.

In a one-hour hearing, Jackman alerted adjudicator Ed MacNamara that if her client had established residence under immigration laws in effect at the time of his entry to Canada, he could not be deported even if he had misrepresented his wartime activities.

In his 1986 report on war criminals in Canada, Justice Jules Deschenes wrote that "the notion of the valid acquisition of a Canadian domicile is dissolved once fraud on entry is established."

Jackman said the defence team was also considering an application to exclude the press from all or part of the proceedings "if there would be a threat to Nemsila's physical safety."

Nemsila is alleged to have entered Canada by fraudulent means or by misrepresenting his wartime activities. He admitted to CTV News that he was a member of the Hlinka Guard, the Slovak counterpart to the German SS.

"My order was to go against the uprisers and put the uprisers down," he said. "I am not guilty. I am not involved personally in anything."

He later blamed "the Jews" for pushing to get him deported.

Nemsila was one of four cases recently launched against suspected Nazi war criminals.

The power of kindness

Although we often lament what we consider to be the obsession by most western media with coverage of events in Israel, our ears always perk up when Israel is in the news. At the same time, we hold our breath lest the news be of tragedy or of terror. But in truth, most of us crave news of Israel. Indeed this paper owes its existence in part to the need to satisfy that craving.

Unfortunately, but understandably, security and politics dominate the news we receive. For many people, especially those who have not personally experienced Israel, the image of Israeli life is primarily shaped by the preponderance of stories on the airwaves, on television screens and in print, on these two recurring themes, neither of which is generally positive or upbeat.

But unreported and thus undiscovered in the incessant stream of news and bulletins from Israel are the stories of ordinary folk doing the "ordinary" things that are too little appreciated for the great deeds they are. In this issue of The CJN our Israel correspondent Leora Frucht writes about a woman, Jane Kimchi, and her publication QUARK, both of which are dedicated "to illuminate some of the countless acts of gemilut chesed or human kindness".

As Kimchi explains, "Chesed is intrinsic to Judaism, but this is not widely recognized...There are a great many untold stories of people who give of themselves to others, not in a brief moment of daring, but rather as an ongoing aspect of their daily lives." QUARK tells some of these untold stories.

Kindness abounds in Israel; as it does here. We simply don't normally notice it.

A story is told (not in QUARK) about a poor man, more than a hundred years ago, who came to the home of a very wise and thoughtful rabbi. The man said that he had come to ask a question regarding the sacred rituals of Passover. He told the rabbi that he could not afford to buy wine, so he wished to know if he could fulfil the obligation to drink four cups of wine during the seder by drinking four cups of milk. The rabbi said that no Jew could fulfill this important religious commandment with milk. The rabbi then gave the man 25 rubles with which to buy wine.

After the man had left, the rabbi's wife went to her husband with a question. Why, she asked, when wine cost two or three rubles, had the rabbi given the man 25?

The rabbi smiled and said: "When a poor Jew asks if he can use milk at his seder because he cannot afford wine, it is obvious that he cannot afford meat either."

Kindness, as the rabbi understood, is the great uplifter of the human soul and sustainer of human dignity. In the pace and preoccupations of our daily lives we often forget this. Thus, we owe Kimchi a debt of gratitude for bringing some of the "quarks" of kindness in Israeli life to our attention and for reminding us of the power in an act of human kindness.

Prairie life

After a hiatus of two months, our series on the Jewish community of Canada resumes with an essay on the Jews of Manitoba and Saskatchewan. CJN Prairie correspondent Myron Love describes past and present Jewish life in the Prairie provinces. He also paints an unembellished picture of two communities which are aging and slowly decreasing in numbers.

But we also read about the determination of the Jewish leadership to counteract the implications of the communities' demographic trends. Looking directly into the future, Don Aronovitch, president of the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council sees a "community headed for a new plateau of cooperation, coordination and inclusiveness. People are realizing that the dollars are fewer and that all the organizations have to work together to better service their constituents."

Let us hope that Aronovitch is correct in his assessment. May their success serve as a role model for community organizations around the country.

Rabbi Bulka defends position on Poles

Hanna Sokolski, president of the Canadian Polish Congress, and Frank Bialystok take issue with a remark I made in my May 11 article in The CJN, saying Poland "was so steeped in anti-Semitism that it eagerly cooperated with the Nazis in the cold-blooded murder of Jews."

Their argument is not with me, it is with history. A few quotes from Encyclopaedia Judaica (EJ), Volume 13, pages 776 and 777, will suffice.

"The entire Polish population was vehemently anti-German, but the vast majority of people were also violently anti-Semitic." (p.776)

"The Nazi propaganda machine cleverly exploited the anti-Semitism existing among the Polish population ... As a result, Jews who had been in hiding on the "Aryan" side were denounced to the Nazis. In many places Poles not only assisted in the search for Jews, but joined the Nazis in torturing and killing them as well. The Polish police, with hardly any exception, took part in the actions and on several occasions were themselves in charge of rounding up the Jews and dispatching them to the death camps." (p.777)

Yes, there were rescue efforts, but, as EJ concludes, "the percentage of Jews saved in Poland was the smallest, since the predominant attitude was hostile, while rescue was the exception to the rule." (p.777)

The author of these statements in EJ is none other than Isaiah Trunk of the YIVO Institute.

In fact, both Mrs. Sokolski and Mr. Bialystok are off the mark, as are their unwarranted missives.

But the fact that they took the trouble to write is not without value. Especially in the case of Mrs. Sokolski, her letter reveals a problem which needs to be confronted.

Whatever judgment is made about yesterday's Poles does not by definition extend to today's Poles. We would prefer and welcome cordial, friendly and cooperative dialogue with the Poles.

But that cannot be based on ignoring or distorting the past. It must be based on awareness of the past, on the failings and sins of that past, on rejection of the hate and anti-Semitism that infused that past.

Any tomorrow based on distorting yesterday has little chance of enduring.

Says few Poles tried to rescue Jews

In his attempt to adhere to historical accuracy purportedly ignored by Rabbi Reuven Bulka, Frank Bialystok (in his letter, CJN May 25) employs language that obfuscates (I hope inadvertently) the issue of the way Poles treated Jews during the World War II. "As for Poles," writes Bialystok, in refutation of Rabbi Bulka's statement, "most were bystanders to the Holocaust, some profited from it, and a relatively small number tried to rescue Jews." Indeed, what is "a relatively small number?"

According to the census of 1931, the Polish population numbered more than 31 million people. Out of this number, 3,268 Poles were involved in rescuing Jews, according to Yad Vashem statistics, which comes to .01 per cent. In Bialystok's spirit of generosity and open mindedness, I will quadruple the number of Polish Righteous which adds up to 13,072. This figure translates to .04 per cent.

Suppose the proverbial Chelm's population was 10,000. Of that number, .04 per cent were wise and the rest fools. Would Chelm qualify as a town which has a relatively small number of wise people or rather be considered a town of fools except for four wise people? I put this question to any statistician worth his/her figures.

It is not often that statistics combine with folklore in the service of historical accuracy as in this case.

'Bitterness still remains in me'

The reply of the Canadian Polish Congress to Rabbi Reuven Bulka in The CJN of May 18 caught my eye.

The polemic regarding the attitude of Poles to their Jewish co-citizens will go on for years. While there were Poles who risked their lives helping and saving Jews, their number was small in comparison to those who denounced the Jews. Some Poles were murdered by other Poles because they did help Jews.

I would love to hear the explanation of the Congress for the policy of the Polish committee (unofficial Polish consulate) in Budapest from 1941 until late fall 1943.

After the occupation of Poland by Germans and Russians, many Poles escaped to Hungary, which was granting them asylum. Upon presentation of a document from the committee certifying citizenship, the office in charge of control and supervision of foreigners in Hungary, gave the refugee a permit allowing him to stay and work in Hungary. In Hungary, a police state, no one could rent a room or even a bed without first registering with the police. But this committee refused to recognize us Jews as Polish citizens and to provide us with a life-saving document.

Living during the war in a police state was most difficult. While those who were granted asylum received a small pension and, living in dignity, calmly awaited the end of the war, we Polish Jews lived in most difficult and dangerous conditions. Many of us were caught by Hungarian police and deported to Poland (in the hands of Gestapo). The blood of those deported and murdered by Germans stains the hands of Poles.

Only in late fall of 1943 (on whose orders I was never able to discover) were we granted (using Catholic Polish names) the proper documents to start a normal life.

I became prosperous in Canada and have spent many vacations in Europe. I did visit Hungary and Romania twice. (I escaped to Romania after the German occupation of Hungary), but never did I set my foot in Poland as the bitterness I felt in those years still remains in me.

THE JEWS OF CANADA Manitoba/Saskatchewan

By MYRON LOVE
Special to The CJN

A planned new Jewish high school and community centre in Winnipeg and a third annual Lag b'Omer celebration in Saskatchewan are symbols of the continuing vitality of long-established western Canadian Jewish communities, despite lack of population growth.

The Jewish communities of Saskatchewan came together to celebrate Lag b'Omer at Lake Manitou for the first time two years ago. "We had about 10 per cent of the Jewish population of the province out last year," says June Avivi, a past president of Saskatoon's Jewish community and principal of the city's Jewish cheder.

In Winnipeg, the Jewish community leadership believes the Jewish Community Campus project will revitalize the community. Work is scheduled to begin on the $26-million south Winnipeg Jewish K-12 school and community centre in the spring, with the completion date set for the fall of 1997. Campus will replace the old north Winnipeg Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate, the downtown YMHA Jewish Community Centre and the south Winnipeg Ramah Elementary School.

The Winnipeg Board of Jewish Education also oversees the K-6 Talmud Torah, at present connected to Joseph Wolinsky. In addition, there is a small Lubavitch day school and a Hebrew bilingual public school program to Grade 8 in north Winnipeg, and another Hebrew bilingual public school elementary program in south Winnipeg.

"Campus will be the focal point of the community," says Bob Freedman, executive director of the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council (WJCC), "but it will be more than a nice building. It will cause the major service providers in the community to develop new relationships and improve upon the ways they deliver their services to the community. The various agencies will learn to work more closely together.

Winnipeg's Jewish community throughout its history has been a "significant and respected community." In Journey Into Our Heritage: The Story of the Jewish People in the Canadian West, historian Harry Gutkin says Jewish settlement in the city began in the late 1870s with a few dozen Jewish individuals from the United States, England and Germany. In 1881, there were 21 Jewish families in Winnipeg and another 12 elsewhere in Manitoba.

The first large influx of Jewish immigrants came in 1882, with the arrival of 1,247 men, women and children escaping persecution in Russia. They were the first of thousands of Jews, mostly escaping from the Pale of Settlement and its poverty and pogroms, who would come west over the next several decades.

With Winnipeg as their jumping off point, the new arrivals fanned out across Manitoba and Saskatchewan, establishing themselves as merchants and farmers. Several Jewish farm colonies were started in the two provinces. Among the best known were Edenbridge, Lipton and Hirsch in Saskatchewan and Camper and Bender Hamlet in Manitoba.

In the interwar years, almost every town and village in Manitoba and Saskatchewan numbered at least one Jewish family and several of the bigger communities had large enough Jewish populations to support a synagogue and cheder.

Winnipeg itself by 1920 had a Jewish population of 14,000 — mainly in the city's north end — and a full range of synagogues, schools (mainly Yiddish-language schools), landsmanshaften, newspapers and cultural and social organizations.

Following World War II, Winnipeg's Jewish community continued to grow, bolstered by the arrival of Holocaust survivors and Jewish families leaving the countryside. The population peaked at 21,000 in the 1961 census.

But a decline in the Jewish population throughout Manitoba and Saskatchewan that began in the 1950s picked up steam in the '60s and '70s.

Gradually, almost all the rural Jewish communities, like many others, closed down. The people on the farms and in the small towns followed their children into Regina and Saskatoon, and primarily Winnipeg. At the same time, many younger Winnipeggers left to seek their fortune in Toronto or Vancouver.

Men at prayer, Jewish Old Folks Home, Winnipeg, early 1920s.

Today, there are no more than a handful of Jews left in rural Manitoba, including several South African doctors and their families, who are temporarily practising in small towns in exchange for being allowed into Canada.

Brandon, Manitoba's second city, has the largest Jewish population outside of Winnipeg. There may be 10 families or individuals, some of whom get together for Passover or Chanukah. For the yamim tovim, some drive into Winnipeg to attend synagogue. A few are on the faculty of Brandon University.

The University of Saskatchewan in Saskatoon injects fresh blood on an ongoing basis into the city's small Jewish population. June Avivi, a lifelong resident of Saskatchewan, reports that Statistics Canada lists over 800 Jews in Saskatoon (overall population about 175,000), but she notes that only 178 families are affiliated with the Agudas Israel Synagogue.

Saskatoon's Jewish population, which dates from the early 1900s (Saskatchewan did not become a province until 1905), has never exceeded a few hundred people. However Avivi and Walter Gumprich, community development officer for the North Saskatchewan Federation, are upbeat about the community's prospects.

The population goes up and down, says Gumprich, who is originally from Glasgow, Scotland. "June and I know the older people but we don't always get to know new arrivals. The fact, though, that our Hebrew school enrolment is up is a positive sign."

He notes that the synagogue sisterhood recently had a Friday night supper. They budgeted for 100 people and had to cut the numbers off at 130.

Although the young people do leave, it is a trend Gumprich encourages. He reasons that they will find Jewish spouses elsewhere and some will move back. Most of the younger people spend a year in Israel while at university and become the teachers in the Hebrew school.

Intermarriage is a concern here, as it is elsewhere. Avivi reports the community is trying to encourage the partners in mixed marriages to participate in the Hebrew school and other community functions.

The community is also trying to encourage younger members to assume leadership roles.

Eileen Curtis, development officer at the South Saskatchewan Jewish Federation office in Regina, is not as optimistic as Gumprich and Avivi. She reports her office has a mailing list of 200 Jewish families including a handful of older residents and some South African families in towns around Regina.

"We have not had any young families move into the community since Crown Life moved its head office here a few years ago," Curtis says.

Most of the community belongs to the traditional Orthodox Beth Jacob Synagogue whose rabbi, Shlomo Truzman, is active in presenting the Jewish community to the wider community. He often speaks to schools and invites school groups to visit the synagogue.

The 5-year-old Reform Temple Tikvah is continuing to grow, with 31 families now

"We have the same problems as Saskatoon," Curtis says. "Most of our young people leave for college elsewhere. This is a close knit community. The kids grow up with each other. They have to leave to find Jewish husbands and wives. Lately though, some have been staying because of the cost of going to school somewhere else."

After two decades of decline, Winnipeg's Jewish population has levelled off at about 15,000 according to the last census. The numbers are little changed from the 1981 census, according to Evelyn Katz, a past president of the community and the director of an ongoing demographic survey for the WJCC.

Within the community, there have been two very noticeable trends over the past few years. One is the aging of the population. Katz reports that 23.5 per cent of Winnipeg's Jewish population is over 65, as compared to 12-15 per cent of the general population.

"We have a higher proportion of seniors than other Canadian Jewish communities," she says. "There has been some shrinkage in the 40-50 age group, which could mean future shrinkage overall. It depends how many younger people may move back from Vancouver and Toronto. Times are tough in those cities. We hear of a lot of younger people who would like to move back if jobs were available."

The other trend is a continuing movement of Jewish Winnipeggers from the north end of the city to the south side River Heights and affluent Tuxedo areas. Where most of the population used to be north, now about at least 50 per cent live south and another 10 per cent in neighborhoods near the downtown and elsewhere.

Katz reports that her surveys indicate 67 per cent of Jewish children under five now live in south Winnipeg and an increasing number of seniors are also moving south to be closer to their children and grandchildren. An anomaly is that most of the synagogues and all the kosher bakeries and restaurants are still located in north Winnipeg.

The community leadership envisages Campus playing a major role in generating renewed enthusiasm and perhaps encouraging former Winnipeggers to return and attracting new people.

"We broke all the rules of fundraising in raising money for Campus," says WJCC president Don Aronovitch enthusiastically. "We raised much of the funds even before we had a site selected. Most fundraisers would say that can't be done. We have raised $19 million (including corporate and government contributions) without impinging on our regular Combined Jewish Appeal campaign (which raises $3 million to $4 million annually — more money per capita than most other North American Jewish communities). That speaks loudly for this community."

In an era of tighter budgets however, the community leadership is re-examining the way the community operates. Currently, the WJCC consists of a 50-member board, elected by the Jewish community at large, and an executive. Last March, a leadership retreat was held to address decision-making and organization. A planning committee is currently writing a report based on the retreat with recommendations as to possible improvements and greater efficiency. The report should be ready by April.

Some summer tidbits

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut

Having sent my latest manuscript to the publisher (a commentary on the Haftarot of the year), and being reasonably au courant with my other literary assignments, I have at last had an opportunity to read some of the journals which are stacked up high and waiting for my attention. Amongst these is a magazine called Utne Reader, a bimonthly publication coming out of Minnesota, which scans some 200 journals and newspapers, in order to extract from them unusual and interesting information. It brings the readers a pot-pourri of brief reprints which they would otherwise never have a chance to see. There is always enough to fill 15 or 20 minutes usefully. Here are some examples which I offer as tidbids for summer reading.

In the United States, every 12 seconds a man beats up his current or former wife or girlfriend, and every day four or five men murder women who are trying to escape them. When the media report these incidents, they often use the language of "love," cold-blooded murder becomes a "crime of passion," as though Miss Lonely-hearts were working the police beat: A man guns down his former wife and a new boyfriend and reporters call it a "love triangle." A man shoots and kills several coworkers, among them a woman who refused to date him. The press reports a "tragedy of spurned love." A man kidnaps his estranged wife, rapes her, accuses her of an imaginary affair and chokes her to death (all in front of the children). A reporter writes that he "made love to his wife," and strangled her when he was "overcome with jealous passion." With love like that who needs hate? (The source was USA Today).

In the August 1994 issue of the American journal called In These Times, Joel Bleifuss published an article entitled Right-Wing Confidential. An excerpt as it appeared in the Utne Reader follows. (Note that this was written several months prior to the November election which brought the Republicans to power.)

"Newt Gingrich and his disciples may be getting most of the attention from the mainstream media during their current romp through Congress, but when it comes to influence and power the Newtonians are small potatoes compared with a small organization most of us have never heard of. When the leadership of the American radical right needs a strategy, chances are very good that the planning will occur in a meeting of the Council for National Policy (CNP).

"The group was launched at a public reception in 1981 and went underground soon after. Today CNP's Washington office will neither confirm nor deny that the group meets at all. We do know that its 500 members include former attorney general Edwin Meese, Jerry Falwell, Oliver North, Senator Jesse Helms and several lesser known but kookier characters. One of them wants to do away with Democracy and transfer the United States into a Christian nation where homosexuals, adulterers, blasphemers, astrologers and others will be executed.

"Though it is tempting to relegate this collection of wacky right-wingers to the fringes of the political landscape, the Republican establishment is married to the Christian right. It cannot win an election without them."

Thus far the prophetic excerpt. The coalition did pull it off last November.

On the lighter side, in my continuing correspondence with the post office, consisting of barbs and occasional laurels, I came across another old envelope. The contents are gone, but the Israeli postage stamp and the writing are very clear indeed. The letter was addressed to The Chief Rabbinate of Toronto, and Canada Post delivered it to my address. In return I informed the authorities that we had no chief rabbinate in our city, and that if indeed we had, it wouldn't be located at 1950 Bathurst Street.

Have a good summer!

On the road again

By Erica Meyer Ranzin

We are planning to hit the road this summer in a way that avoids all the travel hassles of trying to find kosher food and cheap, but not tawdry, lodgings while keeping two adults and three children relatively comfortable.

We're renting an RV, a recreational vehicle. We'll pick it up a few days before we leave, so that my husband and I can hang our family's clothes in the infinitesimal closets and kosher the kitchen, except the oven, which I will close and forget. We're having a microwave summer.

I hope this solves the issues involved with travelling kosher, although it opens up several other challenges, all involving camping and touring for two weeks with the kids. Our children are now at an age range where anything that interests the eldest (age 12) does not interest the youngest (age 5), and vice versa. Our middle child (age 8) is pretty much only interested in make believe princesses and elegantly clothed dolls; so she doesn't much care where we go, as long as Barbie can come, too.

And she can, if she doesn't grow any bigger than 11 inches. That's about the total storage space allotted each child (adults get 12 inches) beyond the necessities of clothing and toothbrushes.

The habit of trailer or cabin living isn't hard to acquire. We first practised it beside Rice Lake, Ont., where we had a little fishing cabin and beautiful, peaceful scenery. The fishing cabin was even smaller than the RV: one room, total, with a kitchenette. The entire fishing camp had one pay phone and was accessible only via a single winding country road. We asked how people got in and out during the winter and were told that they drive pickup trucks across the frozen lake. Since the lake was not frozen when we were there (although the water was mighty cold for a Georgia girl), we didn't get to experiment. The winding road had to serve — and did.

On that trip, we coined our family phrase for maintaining a tidy, compact living space: Good Cabin Keeping. We joked that we could create a Good Cabin Keeping magazine, monthly volumes about maintaining 10 square feet of space in perfect cleanliness.

This is very easy to do if you (and if I) can remember one very simple rule: don't pack anything. Less carried is less clutter. Don't bring three pairs of jeans if two will serve. You realize I can talk a good game, in this regard, but it is hard to put into practice. I am a "just in case" packer, which means my cases are always crammed full.

You can't bring everything you own or meet every contingency in a small cabin or in an RV. You have to search for space saving strategies. One of our tricks this summer is that our travelling kosher kitchen will be dairy only. We might not be able to buy kosher meat everywhere we go anyway, and dairy is easier to replace and lighter to load up. The kids would just as soon live on pasta, so why not? We are eager to show our children that you can live Jewishly anywhere, with a well-kept Sabbath and three kosher meals a day, that being an observant Jew doesn't limit them, it opens the world to them, from here to Rice Lake and back.

So if you see an RV driven by a man with a beard and a kippah bumping along the side roads this summer, give us a wave. We won't be carrying much (I hope), but we'll always have enough bagels to share.

Reinventing the Histadrut

By Shira Herzog

One year later, the shockwaves of what was termed an "earthquake" in Israeli politics are still being felt. In May 1994, Haim Ramon, a maverick renegade from the Labor party and former minister of health, took on the Histadrut establishment, ran as an independent, and was elected chair of the national trade union federation. In the process, Ramon ousted the old guard, led by Labor stalwart Haim Haberfeld.

Ramon's victory in the Histadrut election was significant on several counts. It represented a final, crucial stage in the transformation of the historic, all-encompassing Labor party (or Mapai, as it was formerly called) into a political party like any other that could no longer claim an identity of interests between itself and the state. The Histadrut was established by the party during the pre-state period, not only to represent workers, but to offer them a broad range of social services. Since Mapai was the establishment party in the pre-state community (and, indeed, in the Zionist movement), the Histadrut quickly became a significant economic force. In its heyday, it was described as one of the country's biggest employers, due to its extensive industrial holdings.

Over the last decade, the cracks in the Histadrut's economic empire and cumbersome bureaucracy became apparent. As the Labor party became more identified with the interests of private enterprise, the cost of maintaining and subsidizing a sprawling system that had become an electoral burden vis-a-vis the middle class was clear to the party's leaders. While there was pressure on the Histadrut to divest itself of unprofitable holdings and real estate to pay off significant debt, the issue came to a head in the debate over health care reform.

Without national health insurance, Israelis were traditionally insured through sick funds (kupot cholim). The largest of these was the General Sick Fund, originally established during the British Mandate period as a community health provider, and owned and operated by the Histadrut. However, membership in the sick fund involved automatic membership in the trade union federation and over 25 per cent of paid premiums subsidized other Histadrut activities. Because of this, over the last several years, many Israelis voted with their feet and joined smaller, private sick funds, thereby contributing to the General Sick Fund's economic woes.

Ramon was thwarted by old guard at the Labor party central committee

Two former health ministers, Ehud Olmert of Likud and Haim Ramon of Labor, tried to introduce national health insurance through all the sick funds, that would involve divesting the Histadrut of its ownership of the General Sick Fund. Thwarted by the old guard at the Labor party central committee when the issue was brought to a vote, Ramon decided that "if he couldn't beat them, he would join them." In the election for Histadrut chair, enough Labor members of the Histadrut broke party ranks and decided to support Ramon's platform of reform.

Ramon's surprise victory paved the way to force the Histadrut's hand on the health care issue. The health care bill was passed last winter, and the General Sick Fund is no longer formally an arm of the trade union movement. Israelis pay health care premiums based on income directly to the government through the social insurance system and the government in turn reimburses the sick funds.

Ramon's vision is for a smaller, leaner Histadrut that concentrates on representing the workers' interests specifically on labor issues. While this reform was dictated largely by economic imperatives, Ramon is one of a small group of young Israeli politicians who have questioned the relevance of older institutions and systems that were part of the pre-state heritage. The recent election of Avrum Burg as chair of the World Zionist Organization and Jewish Agency is also an acknowledgement of the need to make those institutions more relevant to present-day needs of world Jewry in its relationship to the State of Israel.

Some political observers feel Ramon gave Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin what he wanted but couldn't deliver himself — a historic change in a structure that had become anachronistic. Since then, Ramon has been forgiven for his "defection" by his colleagues in the Labor party. Indeed, he is viewed by many as a critical factor in their fight for victory at the polls in the national election in the fall of 1996. In Israel, as in other western countries, the status quo is not necessarily what the voters will reward.

Peace and compliance

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Israel and the PLO have their eyes on the calendar.

Later this month, the U.S. Congress will decide whether to breathe new life into the Middle East Peace Facilitation Act, which authorizes funding to the tune of $500 million to the Palestine National Authority (PNA) in the autonomous areas (the Gaza Strip and the West Bank town of Jericho).

The decision turns on one burning issue — whether or not the PNA, headed by Yasser Arafat, has complied with the 1993 Declaration of Principles (DoP) and the accompanying 1994 Cairo accord, the cornerstones of the historic Oslo agreement under which Israel and the PLO finally ended their conflict.

It is a pivotal moment. If the Middle East Peace Facilitation Act is not renewed, supporters argue, economic conditions in Gaza and Jericho will worsen and radicalism will flourish, thereby threatening the spirit of Oslo and the integrity of Arafat's PNA.

Critics, mainly diehard opponents of the current peace process, want the legislation to die. In their view, further U.S. funds should not be provided because the PNA has repeatedly violated the DoP.

It's clear where the Israeli government stands. Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, backed by the Clinton administration, believes that the Middle East Peace Facilitation Act — which officially expires on June 30 unless otherwise extended — is crucial to the success of the Oslo accord.

Stripped of its partisan passions, the debate over renewal comes down to one overarching question: Has the PNA been faithful to the DoP?

Or, for that matter, has Israel?

Even the most ardent Israeli advocates of the Oslo agreement are not completely satisfied with the PNA's performance so far. "I am greatly displeased with the way the Palestinians are implementing the accord," Yossi Sarid, a cabinet minister, said recently.

But on balance, Israel is generally satisfied with the level of PNA compliance, a position echoed by Israel's ambassador to the United States and Rabin's confidant, Itamar Rabinovich. As he put it: "[The] bottom line is that it is mostly satisfactory. We have our comments, our criticisms, our reservations, but it's very clear to us that the PLO has by and large delivered — albeit with some flaws and shortcomings."

In line with the DoP, and in cooperation with Israel, the PNA has taken steps to establish self-rule and to maintain order. But there have been tremendous problems — caused by factional splits in the Palestinian movement, Arafat's authoritarian style of governing, a moribund economy and, of course, an upsurge in terrorism aimed against Israelis.

Leaving terrorism aside for a moment, the most egregious PLO violation of the DoP has been its failure to amend the Palestine National Covenant.

In a letter to Rabin before the DoP was formally ratified in Washington on Sept. 13, 1993, Arafat pledged to purge the charter of articles which call for Israel's destruction. But nearly two years later, Arafat has yet to convene the Palestine National Council (the parliament of the PLO), which is empowered by a two-thirds majority to alter the charter.

Is Arafat deliberately stalling because he lacks support in the Palestine National Council? There is certainly solid opposition to his relatively conciliatory policies.

Arafat antagonized many Palestinians by making unacceptable concessions to Israel. He agreeed to leave Israeli settlements in place during the interim period. He agreed to defer discussions about Jerusalem and the nature and size of a Palestinian polity. He agreed to turn a blind eye to the right of Palestinian refugees to "return" to their former homes in what is now Israel. By doing so, writes one observer, Mark Rosenblum, the political director of Americans for Peace Now, he broke from the Palestinian national consensus.

Arafat's failure to modify the charter can also be ascribed to his analysis that Israel has failed to comply with key provisions of the DoP. Due to the spate of terrorism in Israel and the territories — a carnage that has claimed the lives of about 130 civilians and soldiers since September 1993 — Rabin has delayed Palestinian elections in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. And much to the PNA's disappointment, he has not deployed Israeli forces there. July 1 is now the latest target date for expanding Palestinian autonomy.

Furthermore, Arafat is bitter over the expansion of Jewish settlements in the territories and the breakneck pace of Israeli construction in East Jerusalem, which was annexed by Israel in 1967. As well, he is upset by Israel's decision to freeze the scheduled release of upwards of 6,000 Palestinian prisoners and to delay the opening of the "safe passage" route between Gaza and Jericho.

But since the April 9 attacks in the heart of Gaza which killed seven Israeli soldiers and an American Jewish tourist, the PNA has been more resolute. There have been widespread arrests and, in summary trials, some 20 Palestinians accused of terrorism and sedition have been slapped with prison sentences. (Many detainees, though, have been released).

Arafat's get-tough policy has encouraged Israel. But Rabin realizes that Arafat has only so much manoeuverability. If he acts too resolutely, he risks antagonizing Palestinians who sympathize with Muslim fundamentalists and touching off a civil war. Yet if he coddles the forces of terrorism, which pose a strategic threat to the peace process, Rabin may have no alternative but to freeze negotiations with the PLO — with all the attendant consequences — and to rely on closures to keep Palestinian workers out of Israel.

The closures have had a devastating effect on the struggling Palestinian economy, costing the PNA about $2 million a day in losses. The Israeli government is painfully aware that this situation plays directly into the hands of Palestinian rejectionists. Gen. Amnon Shahak, Israel's chief of staff, has warned that continued closures may heighten despair, strenghten Arafat's foes and unintentionally bring down the PNA.

Israel's procrastination is a function of its displeasure with Palestinian terrorism. Indeed, terrorism is the chief thorn in the side of the peace process.

In signing the DoP, the PLO promised to renounce terrorism and to assume responsibility for preventing it. In practice, however, Arafat has not always lived up to his solemn commitments.

PLO promised to prevent terrorism

There have been times when he has remained conspicuously silent in the face of terrorist acts. On other occasions, his subordinates have issued denunciations on his behalf. Only lately, particularly since the Beit Lid incident which claimed the lives of 21 Israelis, has Arafat issued direct and unambigous statements against terrorism.

Arafat, too, has been taken to task for not physically cracking down on terrorism — spearheaded by Islamic fundamentalists linked with Hamas and Islamic Jihad (which oppose the peace process and his leadership of the Palestinian movement).

But as long as the PNA cannot stamp out terrorism (which Israel failed to do in Gaza and still has not achieved in the West Bank), Israel may have no choice but to slam the brakes on the peace process.

Arafat knows what Israel expects of his fledgling administration. Nevertheless, PNA infractions of the DoP accumulate. Not surprisingly, the most serious are related to terrorism. According to Israel's Judge Advocate General, the PNA has not confiscated illegal weapons and explosives and has refused to extradite terrorist suspects.

In matters unrelated to terrorism, the PLO has violated the DoP by opening institutions in East Jerusalem — which it claims as its future capital — rather than in the autonomous areas, according to Peace Watch.

Despite these violations, Israel is not only inclined to press ahead with the peace process, since there is no viable alternative, but to solicit international funding for the PNA.

Israel proceeds from the assumption that the uninterrupted flow of aid to the PNA is in its own vested interest. If the PLO fails, Hamas — the main standard-bearer of Islamic fundamentalism — will be waiting in the wings to supplant Arafat. This is Israel's greatest fear and the imperative which drives its policy today. It is also the underlying reason for Israel's patience with PLO violations of the DoP.

Ukrainians and Jews

Newly independent Ukraine, with a Jewish population of about 500,000, has thrown its support behind the Jewish cultural and religious revival there and forged cordial ties with Israel.

But, as a new documentary from Ukraine reminds us, the past intrudes on the present, casting "a dark shadow" on Jewish-Ukrainian relations.

The film, And A New Day Will Come, is directed by Roman Shyrman, a 42-year-old Jew from Kiev. It was made for the National Cinemateque of Ukraine, mainly in response to a CBS TV segment on Sixty Minutes which left the impression that anti-Semitism is on the rise in Ukraine. I saw the English-language version, narrated by Taras Hunczak of Rutgers University.

According to the Ukrainian Weekly, a Jersey City, N.J. newspaper published by the Ukrainian National Association, And A New Day Will Come is "a masterful documentary."

But does it really deserve this fulsome compliment? Before going any further, let it be said that it is well-intentioned. Shyrman and his associates obviously want to improve a relationship that is marred by mutual suspicion and hostility.

But if that is ever to happen, both sides will have to conveniently forget the indignities and blood-letting of the past, which, to put it bluntly, is unlikely.

Bogdan Khmelnitsky (1595-1657), a revered figure in Ukrainian history, is one compelling reason why these relations are so emotionally divisive. To Ukrainians, he is a hero in the uprising against the Polish oligarchy. But to Jews, he is a diabolical pogromist who cut a swath of death and destruction across the Jewish community.

In the film, the narrator rhetorically asks: "Why did Khmelnitsky's Cossacks murder Jews? For the crucifixion of Christ? For the disrespect shown Ukrainians...? For [their]loyal service to Polish rulers...?"

The last question is legitimate, since Polish landlords employed Jewish rent collectors. But to imply that Jews killed Christ or displayed arrogance toward Ukrainians is not only inaccurate but calumnious.

It is further suggested, by a Ukrainian intellectual named Myroslav Marynovych, that the eradication of the stereotype of the Jew as a "money lender" is contingent on the disappearance of the stereotype of Khmelnitsky as a murderer.

Is Marynovych insinuating that Ukrainian anti-Semitic attitudes are understandable if Jews do not drop their negative view of Khmelnitsky?

Regrettably, And A New Day Will Come glosses over two crucial periods — the pogroms in Ukraine in 1919 and 1920 that unfolded under the nose of Ukrainian leader Symon Petlura, and the collaboration of certain Ukrainian nationalists with Nazi Germany.

Clearly, the crimes of former years cannot be reduced to a few pat words. And a dramatic improvement in Jewish-Ukrainian relations will remain elusive until both sides face the past unflinchingly.

RABBI HOWARD S. JOSEPH

After the event we call the Akedah, the binding but not the killing of Isaac on the altar, God reiterates the promise to Abraham that his descendants will be as the stars; but he adds that they will be as the sands on the seashore.

What human disposition is linked to the sand on the seashore? Rabbi Naphtali Zvi Yehudah Berlin explains that sand symbolizes strength. After all, the waves batter the seashore and are broken by it. The sand, despite its tiny grains, succeeds in holding back the mighty sea. The seashore is a barrier which stands heroically against a constant and powerful force.

For Rabbi Berlin, this foreshadows Jewish history. Our people, despite our numbers, will always be a minority vis-a-vis the nations of the world. We will maintain our integrity and not be swept away by them.
